At least four file for council

Common Council needs to fill seat with Foster's appointment to Legislature

By Reba Lean

As of press time Jan. 5 there are four contenders for Seat B of the Nome Common Council. They are Jim West Jr., Betsy Brennan, Laura Lawrence and Tim Smith.

"I think I have a little different perspective to contribute to the council," Smith said. He feels that there are sources of income in the region that aren't being taken full advantage of, and there is a real need to diversify the economy.

Brennan thought that being a council member "would be a really neat opportunity." She's served on boards in the community in the past, most recently the Nome Public Schools Board of Education. "I love living in Nome, and I would like to be involved in the process of making decisions for Nome's future," she said.

Lawrence wanted to step up for the city when she heard the special circumstances surrounding the open seat. "I'm just looking to contribute to the community," she said. She feels she has a willingness to serve and help out.

West, a member of the volunteer ambulance service and fire department as well as the port commission feels that he has the experience needed for the council. While he doesn't have a specific platform, he says, "I'm pro-development," and says he would like to keep costs and taxes down.

The four prospective council members are proposing to replace Neal Foster, who is now a state representative, taking over his father, Richard Foster's, long-held position. He resigned from his city position in November, and his resignation was accepted at the Dec. 13 meeting. The last day available for submitting letters of interest for

Moving musk ox temper opening weekend harvest

By Tyler Rhodes

Perhaps the musk ox are wiser than we think. On a gorgeous opening weekend of the subsistence hunt for the shaggy creatures, few musk ox were to be found in the usual haunts close to Nome. "This is the first time that I can recall having hunters come in on a Monday morning unsuccessful," said Alaska Department of Fish and Game biologist Tony Gorn little longer to be completed.

the morning of Jan. 4. For many on the Seward Peninsula, the first days of the year are spent in the pursuit of musk ox with the opening of the subsistence hunt on Jan. 1. While harvest quotas were met in a matter of days last year, some portions of the 2010 winter hunt may take a

While harvest reports were still coming into the Nome ADF&G office on Tuesday following the opening weekend, the early numbers showed that less than half of the available quota was taken in the unit closest to Nome. Gorn said before noon on Tuesday that 12 of the available 34 musk ox in Unit 22C were reported to his office. In the subsistence hunt, successful hunters are required to report their kill within 48 hours.

Hunters who expected to find herds not too far west of the Penny River in Unit 22C over the weekend were treated to stunning and ex-

Health Corp. has now lifted the restrictions on who may receive the vaccine. Previously, due to limited supplies, only those in certain priority categories were administered the shot.

Walk-in appointments are available from 1 p.m. to 4 p.m. Monday through Friday at the Nome Health Center. Two-thirds of the dosages are set to head to the villages, while about 500 will stay in Nome. "These should last a couple weeks, easily,' said nurse Terry Romenesko as she opened her fridge at the Public Health Building.

This shipment is the largest Nome has seen yet, but it is not expected to be the last. Smaller shipments are scheduled in the weeks to come, and more dosages are readily available for ordering, Public Heath Nursing Director Chris Kilby said. The dosages come to the hospital in multi-dosage vials or in ready-made shots. The ready-made shots are handy for sending out to villages where fewer dosages are needed.

Kilby recommends that children ages 6-10 receive two shots for better protection. If needed, appointments other than the scheduled walk-in times can be made by calling 443-3221.

A SHOT IN THE ARM—NSHC Public Health Director Chris Kilby gives Norton Sound employee Roy Agloinga his H1N1 vaccine Dec. 30. Increased supplies mean all are eligible for the shot.

I recently watched a documentary called "Food Inc." The documentary was about where the food that we buy at our grocery stores actually comes from. Apparently things have changed quite a bit from the old days on the farms in the lower 48 states. The quaint little farms that I imagined my pork, chicken and beef coming from are no longer supplying most of the meat that we buy at our grocery stores here in Nome. In fact, almost all of the meat in the U.S. is now controlled by a handful of companies that force the farmers they employ to use "factory farming methods." I did some research on factory farming and found out that these methods could negatively affect our health. The animals raised on factory farms are fed antibiotics on a consistent basis that collect in the animals' tissues and milk. When we eat the meat, eggs or drink the milk from these animals, we lose our ability to fight certain strains of bac-

Not only do these practices negatively affect our health, they cause extreme pain and suffering to the animals that are raised in these factory farms, mainly chickens, turkeys, cows and pigs. According to the

A Grain of Salt

"There's a sucker born every minute" — P.T. Barnum

The old adage, "If it's too good to be true, it probably isn't," is a good rule to keep in mind and on a little card next to our computer. There are so many scam artists on the Internet that we need to keep constant vigilance to attempts to sucker us out of our money. The Queen of Africa's London solicitor is waiting for us to claim an inheritance, the Canadian drug companies want to peddle Viagra, the bank we do or don't deal with has a problem with our account, just let them know our account number ... Blah, blah! Some Somalia pirates are trolling the Internet waiting to snag a few fish. One wonders how they get away with such bad grammar and poor spelling, yet they must catch a lot of gullible people. And folks really are gullible. The number of recent calls this newspaper had received asking about alien abductions is mind boggling. Callers insist it is true because they saw it

There are a lot of positive features about the Internet and it has a wide audience. However it is rife with lies and horse manure. There are amazing numbers of folks who put up blogs and web pages where the content is complete nonsense, untrue, inflammatory, hate-filled and just plain wrong. The truth is so limiting. There is no editor or newsroom to check facts and filter out the horse manure. Too many bloggers are fast and footloose with the facts and common sense has gone out the window

So what can we do? Be a skeptic, ask questions, get educated, study logic and understand that banks and credit card companies never send you an email. So, make it a point in 2010 to be Internet smart and keep the salt shaker handy and the b.s. meter turned on. Don't get scammed. - N.L.M.-

ASPCA, a factory farm is a largescale industrial operation that houses thousands of animals at one time. These factory farms confine animals to small cages with metal bars, ammonia-filled air and artificial lighting or no lighting at all (meaning no windows). They force breeding animals to produce young at unnaturally accelerated rates, causing exhaustion and stress. When the farm factories transport livestock to slaughter plants, sick or injured animals that fall or die on the way are forced onto slaughter trucks, often with a bulldozer. The ASPCA also states that the food companies emploving these factory farms genetically alter animals' bodies to prevent them from acting out in aggression or anxiety caused by living in such extreme confinement.

In the documentary I watched the chickens they showed had been genetically altered to produce more white meat. The chickens grew at such an accelerated rate that their bones could not keep up with their rapid weight gain and they had trouble standing. Many fell and died in mounds of their own feces, long before the rest were taken to be slaughtered. The dead chickens were then recycled to be fed to other animals. Even the most minimum humane standards proposed in various states are stopped by the powerful food companies that have an oligopoly on the market. I believe that if we as human beings are responsible for bringing animals into this world, we should also be responsible for treating them in a humane way where they do not have to needlessly suffer, even if we are raising them for

I really love to eat meat, but after becoming educated about where it comes from, I have reservations about buying this meat from our grocery stores. However, there are things that we can do as a community to combat this problem. In my research, I found out about a non-profit organization called Humane Farm Animal Care. They are responsible for the Certified Humane Raised and Handled Program. The Certified Humane Raised and Handled program is a certification and labeling program that is the only animal welfare label requiring the humane treatment of farm animals from birth through slaughter. The goal of the program is to improve the lives of farm animals by driving consumer demand for kinder and more responsible farm animal practices. Their website (http://www.certifiedhumane.org/) states, "when you see the Certified Humane Raised and Handled® label on a product you can be assured that the food products have come from facilities that meet precise, objective standards for farm animal treatment." For more information please visit their website at http://www.certifiedhumane.org/ On this website you will find information about the specific requirements farmers have to meet in order to label their products as Certified Humane Raised and Handled.

Since becoming educated about this issue, I have been searching through every grocery store here in Nome for the Certified Humane Raised and Handled label. I found that Nome Trading Company carries "Ranger" chicken, beef and pork. I closely read the label and saw a note on the meat stating that it was humanely raised and handled. I would really like to encourage all of our grocery stores to carry meat and dairy products that have the Certified Humane Raised and Handled label, even if it is just a few items. I know that it may cost a little bit more, but I and others that I have spoken with are willing to pay a little extra in having the comfort of knowing that the meat we are buying comes from an animal that did not terribly suffer in its short and painful life. I would also like to encourage the restaurants in town to purchase meat and dairy products with the Certified Humane Raised and Handled label, even if it is only a few things. Every little purchase makes a big difference in market demand for these humane raised and handled products.

For more information visit the ASPCA Farm Animal Cruelty site at http://www.aspca.org/fight-animalcruelty/farm-animal-cruelty/what-isa-factory-farm.html or the Humane Farm Animal Care website at http://www.certifiedhumane.org/ Sincerely,

The Corner Office

By Jason Evans

What does a board do?

I have been asked by several people, "What does a board member do?" I think this is a great question, and one that not only the general public doesn't always understand, but also one many board member themselves don't understand. I have served several boards ranging from our village and regional corporation to statewide non-profits. I have seen both effective and ineffective board members and I believe this makes a tremendous difference in how well a corporation performs.

It is said that the single responsibility of a board is to: create and build an effective organization. From my experience, a board member has five important duties and depending on the organization's current situation and history, some of these items will have more importance than the other:

- Hire and fire the CEO as needed by the corporation.
- 2. Set strategic direction for management to follow.
- 3. Allocate resources, both human and financial.
- 4. Monitor performance. This role is often left out or skipped by most
- 5. Provide a buffer for the CEO. A board must work as a team with the CEO and from time-to-time take the heat of both individual decisions by the CEO and strategic direction.

When a Board collectively fulfills these duties they provide a system of checks and balances by creating a process of participation from the board as a group. This adds judgment and protects the corporation and prevents an abuse of power, self-dealing, favoritism and just plain foolishness. Without this system of checks and balances, a corporation is dependent on the performance of the CEO and loses the collective wisdom of the group.

For these reasons a board is extremely important to building a better organization. This added layer of oversight may slow down decision making, but it will provide for stakeholder input and a much needed system of checks and balances. When a board is working collectively for the common good, it is an enjoyable and rewarding experience to be a part of the process.

Oil spills irk governor

Concerned that recent oil spills sully Alaska's reputation for responsible resource development, Governor Sean Parnell called executives at both BP Exploration and Alyeska Pipeline Service Company to give them a scolding. In December, two significant spills occurred at Prudhoe Bay and one in Prince William Sound on Christmas Eve. The spills in the Prudehoe fields contaminated several thousand square feet snow-covered land.

In November, a spill of 46,000 gallons of oil, water and natural gas was reported. Officials also investigated another oil spill of about 7,100 gallons of water with oily residue. In Prince William Sound, a tugboat enroute to Valdez ran aground on Bligh reef and left a three-mile sheen of fuel oil on the water.

Parnell has asked the attorney general and commissioners of Environmental Conservation and Natural Resources to review these spills, and to make recommendations early in 2010 related to spill prevention and enforcement.

Parnell fights new EPA rule

The state of Alaska is fighting a new EPA rule that seeks to regulate greenhouse gas emissions under the Clean Air Act. The Clean Air Act is the law that defines the Environmental Protection Agency's responsibilities for protecting and improving the nation's air quality and the stratospheric ozone layer - one would think it would include the regulation of greenhouse gases.

On January 2, Parnell sent a letter to the Obama administration requesting that the Environmental Protection Agency halt its effort to regulate greenhouse gases under the Clean Air Act. The letter to EPA administrator Lisa Jackson said the proposed regulatory regime would have a detrimental effect on Alaska.

bury Alaska's businesses, institutions and the state's environmental agencies in regulatory burden. The letter also lets shine through Parnell's opinion on the current administration. He said he would continue to stand up against this unprecedented

Health care reform bill passed U.S. Senate

News Briefs

Alaska Senators voted along party lines when the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act, aka new health care legislation, passed the Senate last week. U.S. Sen. Mark Begich, D-Alaska, said that he voted in favor of the bill because he didn't accept the status quo. "This legislation ends discrimination for pre-existing conditions; ends discrimination based on gender; makes it illegal for insurance companies to drop your coverage if you get sick; extends the solvency of the Medicare trust fund by an additional 10 years while cutting waste, fraud and abuse in Medicare; makes prescription drugs more affordable; requires insurance companies to pay for preventive care," said Begich.

U.S. Sen. Lisa Murkowski, R-Alaska, voted against the bill, taking offense to a price tag she pegs at $2.5 trillion and alleges that the bill was written in secret behind closed doors of the majority leader's office. Murkowski said, "I could not support legislation that would cause health care costs and insurance premiums to rise, as this bill does, according to the non-partisan Budget Office. The CBO said that premiums for individuals without employer-sponsored coverage would rise between 10 and 13 percent, which in Alaska could affect up to 28,000 people."

Alaska Governor Sean Parnell also responded critical to the Senate's bill. He ordered the Alaska attorney general to review the legislation and requested the commissioner of the Department of Health and Social Services and the director of state/federal relations to update the state's policy analysis of pending health care legislation.

Parnell said, "Forcing citizens to purchase health insurance is not only bad policy, it may raise serious legal and constitutional issues." When Congress returns back to session, the House and Senate are slated to solve the differences between their respective health care bills.

Alaska's minimum wage increases

Starting January 1, Alaska's minimum wage increased from $7.25 per hour to $7.75 per hour. Despite the increase, Alaska is near the top of the highest cost of living list and other westerns states have higher minimum wages, such as Washington with $8.55, Oregon with $8.40 and California with $8.

Census to start in Noorvik

ANCHORAGE (AP) - U.S. Census Bureau workers are about to begin their 2010 count of Alaskans living in communities off the road system. The visits beginning Jan. 25 are earlier than the official national start because the census wants to catch rural Alaskans before spring breakup, when many head off to fish camps and other subsistence pursuits. Census Bureau director Robert Groves has said he will fly to Noorvik in northwest Alaska to get the count under way. The official start of the 2010 census is April 1.

pansive views with a full moon and cloudless skies. Despite the near-perfect conditions, those sweeping views often didn't include musk ox. "Hunters are benefitting from great weather; however, what they're not benefitting from is a much different distribution of musk ox groups from what we've seen the last five years," Gorn said.

That's not to say there were no musk ox being hauled back to Nome. Those who were willing to venture farther out were more likely to be rewarded for the extra seat time. In addition to the 12 harvested in 22C, nine were reported by early Tuesday from the Kuzitrin River drainage in Unit 22D and five from Unit 22B west of the Darby Mountains. Those portions of Units 22D and 22B each have a quota of 11 musk ox. In Unit 22D Southwest, near Teller, two cows were reported harvested by Tuesday morning. That area has a quota of seven animals, five of which can be cows.

As of early Monday, two of the four cows that were permitted to be harvested from the Kuzitrin were taken. No cows were allowed to be harvested in 22B or 22C. Nevertheless, Gorn said one cow was among the dozen musk ox reported taken in 22C. Several cows and calves were shot during last winter's hunt, either by a hunter misidentifying his target or the result of a pass-through shot that struck the intended animal and then continued on to hit another. Gorn said he had not heard of any other cases of taking the wrong sex or any cases of waste as of late Tuesday morning.

Gorn said of the animals being taken, it appears more younger, 2-to 3-year-old bulls are being selected by hunters. While mature bulls are easier to differentiate from cows by their pronounced boss horns-both male and female musk ox have horns-the older bulls tend to possess much tougher meat. As a subsistence hunt, current regulations call for the destruction of the horns on musk ox with a boss horn. Besides perhaps giving successful hunters better meat, Gorn said the taking of younger animals could also be seen as a positive in Unit 22C. "It does help preserve some of the mature bulls in 22C. We've definitely seen a decline in the mature bull-to-cow ratio," he said. "In that respect it's good to spread out the harvest in the different age classes."

While finding the musk ox may have been a bit more challenging this winter, once located, they are generally an easy animal to hunt. Unlike many big game animals that flee when approached, musk ox tend to form a circle for defense. Perhaps more than anything, successful hunters need patience to both identify their target and wait for a clear shot. "Even though it's been cold and windy [in past years], it's been a gentleman's hunt," Gorn said.

While out-of-area hunters have again traveled to the region for a chance to hunt musk ox, which in the past was only available through competitive drawing permits, Gorn said their numbers appeared to be fewer than last year.

This year's hunt is set up a bit differently than last year, allowing permit holders to hunt three different sub-unit areas under the same permit. Gorn said along with the scattered herds, he believes the permit change has been a factor in helping distribute hunters more widely across the available area. "We've seen more musk ox killed in the Kuzitrin," he said.

Also likely attracting hunters north of Nome was the opening of a moose hunt as well Jan. 1 in the Kuzitrin. While last year hunters were not allowed to possess both a musk ox and moose permit at the same time, that restriction was lifted this winter. Hunters holding both permits who headed north had more of a chance coming home with meat. As of late Tuesday morning, Gorn said two of the available 14 antlered bulls were reported harvested. Gorn said only one moose was harvested in the same hunt last year.

Another moose hunt in the region was closed Monday night by emergency order. The quota of five antlered moose had been met in Unit 22B west of the Darby Mountains. If the quotas are met in various musk ox and moose hunts in other areas of Unit 22, the Department of Fish and Game will close them as well by emergency order. Current hunting regulations and updated emergency closure information can be found by following links on the department's website at www.wildlife.alaska.gov. LET'S PRAY FOR WIND—Nome Joint Utility System's John Handeland and Banner Wind management team president Roy Ashenfelter sign the long-awaited contract that allows NJUS to buy back excess energy from the wind farm on Banner Peak. Joining in the ceremony are (back row, left to right) Bering Straits Native Corp.'s Jerald Brown, Sitnasuak Native Corp.'s Trudy Sobocienski, BSNC President Tim Towerak, Utility Board Member Berda Willson, Nome Mayor Denise Michels and Banner Wind's Neal Foster.

It's a safe bet Jeff King wants some of his money back.

Following the Iditarod's December announcement of a $100,000 cut in the purse for the 2010 race, the four-time champion this week ponied up $50,000 of his own funds to help build back the prize money. The Denali Park musher said in a press release that the donation was his way of giving back to a race that has given him so much. The gift was also made in hopes of spurring others to donate to the race that was hit hard by the loss of sponsorships.

King will be among those looking to get a portion of that purse when he points his sled toward Nome in early March for his 21st Iditarod.

State urges filing online for PFD

Don't wait for those thick Permanent Fund Dividend booklets to be stuffed into your post box as a reminder to file for the annual PFD.

The state's PFD division is now trying to cut down on paper applications and urges Alaskans to file online. The state's Permanent Fund Division last year decided to streamline the process. Division director Deborah Bitney said the paper booklets are not an efficient way to reach all Alaskans. The division plans to spend the money saved from sending out 450,000 of the booklets on a media campaign to reach Alaskans who haven't filed yet. Booklets will still be available at the Nome Legislative Information Office in the state building.

The first days of filing online for the 2010 PFD ended in chaos for Alaskans who wanted to donate portions of their PFD to charitable foundations under the Pick.Click.Give program. The link to Pick.Click.Give didn't work for some, others reported they were timed out before the long list of about 500 Alaskan organizations to chose from appeared. Bitney encouraged people to file their application online and try to use the Pick.Click.Give link during off-peak traffic times. The Pick.ClickGive program is administered by the Rasmuson Foundation. In Nome, the Bering Sea Women's Group, Kawerak and Nome Preschool are listed as charitable or educational organizations eligible for PFD donations.

The program is in its second year. Last year, 545,000 Alaskans donated some of their PFD via Pick.Click.Give. To file online for the PFD go to www.pfd.alaska.gov.

Happy New Year from the Nome Community Center

A look back at 2009

A sampling of headlines from the past year

By Tyler Rhodes

With the closing of the books on another year, The Nome Nugget takes the opportunity to look back on just a few of the events that made headlines this year in Nome and the region.

In the headlines

Nomeites learned a couple of iconic pieces of real estate in Nome are in danger of being lost to public enjoyment. Pilgrim Hot Springs was put on the block to satisfy financial obligations of the Catholic Bishop of Northern Alaska in the wake of sexual abuse claim settlements. The White Alice towers on Anvil Mountain just north of Nome are slated to be torn down in the future as the board of directors of Sitnasuak Native Corp. voted to have them removed before the property on which they sit is given to the Native corporation by the federal government.

Spring couldn't come fast enough for most Nomeites after a late-winter series of storms that pounded the region one after another for several weeks. At one point the near-record snowfall shut down streets, the airport and schools. The bountiful white stuff required that the city find extra funds to cover budget shortfalls due to all the manhours and equipment needs to remove the snow.

The news at the Rock Creek Mine outside of Nome was mostly no news. Mine owner and operator NovaGold maintained the same line all year that it would continue to mull the prospect of restarting the idled open-pit gold operation north of Nome.

Nome's Junior Reserve Office Training Corps. program received two life lines from Sitnasuak Native Corp. in the form of two $100,000 donations. The donations, made through a state tax credit program, have kept the JROTC program functioning in the wake of both the city and school district declining to fund it in the face of budget cuts.

Volunteers frustrated with seeing too many perish on the streets during Nome's cold winters came together and formed the Nome Emergency Shelter Team. Operating out of the Nome Nazarene Church, the group managed to run a shelter when temperatures dipped well below 0° F starting in March and resuming again in November. Since the NEST shelter started operating, no one has frozen to death on Nome's streets.

Farewells

In 2009, Nome lost two of its iconic citizens and leaders. Legendary Seward Peninsula businessman and Board of Trade owner Jim West Sr. died Oct. 1 at the age of 82. For 50 years, West called Nome home, running and profiting from myriad ventures.

Fewer than two weeks later,

Nome would again lose one of its favorite sons with the passing of Rep. Richard Foster Oct. 13. He was 63. Born in Nome, Foster rose to be one of the region's greatest advocates and leaders in state politics, serving in the House for nearly 21 years.

Memorial services for both men filled the Nome Recreation Center.

Changing of guard

Nome and House District 39 will again be served by a Rep. Foster after Neal Foster was selected by the governor to serve out his late father's term in the Legislature. Foster, along with Ralph "Weaver" Ivanoff and Sam Towarak Sr., were selected by a local committee as potential replacements for Rep. Richard Foster who died in October. Neal Foster was sworn in by Lt. Gov. Craig Campbell in Anchorage on Nov. 16.

On May 7, one of Nome's own took over the leadership of Norton Sound Health Corp. After serving as interim president and chief executive officer of the health care organization since February, the board of directors officially gave Carol Piscoya the job. Born and raised in Nome, Piscoya had previously served as the health corporation's vice president of community health services.

Nome received a new police chief with the arrival of John Papasodora this fall. Papasodora accepted the position, replacing interim chief Dallas Massie who held the post since early 2009 after Paul Burke's departure. Both Papasodora and Massie are former Alaska State Troopers.

Nome Elementary School students were welcomed by a new principal this fall as Shari Biscotti started her first year as the school's leader. She replaced the retiring Carl White.

The Nome Board of Education saw some shuffling as its president, Gloria Karmun, resigned during the summer to pursue employment with the district. When the two candidates to replace her, Joel Alowa and Lynette Schmidt, tied in evaluative scoring by the remaining board members, it was up to a coin toss to decide who would serve. Fortune favored Schmidt that evening and she served all the way up to a run-off election in the fall when she ultimately lost the seat to Heather Payenna. In the initial election in October, Karmun made a return to the board, replacing Betsy Brennan. Karmun eventually was voted in again as president.

In April the board named Jon Wehde as the district's new superintendent, replacing Rick Luthi who retired after one year at the helm.

the regional Native corporation's president, Tim Towarak. Having served as BSNC's general counsel and executive vice president since 2003, Schubert was named chief executive officer in early December.

After leading Nome's Native corporation in an interim status since the spring, Trudy Sobocienski was officially named the president and chief executive officer of Sitnasuak Native Corp. in the summer. Sobocienski was appointed interim president and CEO after Robert Fagerstrom left the position. Fagerstrom or other company officials never did say why the change in leadership occurred.

Visitors

The World, a luxury cruise ship in which its well-heeled passengers own their suites and condominiums, paid a visit to Nome this summer. The ship travels the globe with its residents boarding and leaving as they please.

Sen. Lisa Murkowski, Gov. Sean Parnell and what seemed like at least half of the Alaska State Legislature visited Nome in 2009. Many of the Legislature's members were in Nome this fall to pay their respects to the late Rep. Richard Foster. Sen. Murkowski spent a half day visiting the hospital, schools and the public in the fall. Gov. Parnell came to make the announcement that he had selected Neal Foster to fill his late father's shoes in the Legislature.

The U.S. Coast Guard paid a long and busy visit to Nome in August, staging the majority of its Arctic Crossroads operation out of the Gold Rush City. The exercises brought boats, aircraft, personnel and military and government officials to the area to train and assess the area's available resources and needs.

Several ships and their crews passed through Nome's port on their way to or from the Northwest Passage. Among those was the Ocean Watch, a vessel attempting to circumnavigate North and South America while promoting ocean conservation. As of press time, the vessel, which started its journey in Seattle, was in Argentina.

Victory and defeat

Those lining the chute leading up the Burled Arch were treated to a familiar scene in March as Lance Mackey made his third victorious charge up Nome's Front Street in the 2009 Iditarod. After three wins in a row, Mackey is now permanently etched in the history books of the 1,000-mile race from Willow to Nome. Mackey's win came as he put all challengers out of contention by braving his way through a windstorm that left most of the field either well behind or stalled out in Shaktoolik. Besides the win, Mackey also took home the race's most coveted prize, the Alaska Airlines Leonhard Seppala Humanitarian Award for the musher who gives his dogs the best care.

Before the four-legged dogs make their way to Nome, the Iron Dogs first have at the trail. This year, riding a pair of Polaris Dragons, Todd Minnick and Nick Olstad won the world's longest snowmachine race in record time, edging the Ski-Doo team of Tyler Aklestad and Tyson Johnson by just 3 minutes, 18 seconds. Nome marks the race's halfway point. Nome's Mike Morgan placed an impressive fifth in his first year racing the Iron Dog.

And if racing across Alaska by snowmachine or dog team doesn't impress you, Tim Hewitt's perseverance and determination must. The Pennsylvania endurance runner took the title in this year's Iditarod Trail Invitational race. Traveling by foot in oversized running shoes, the lawyer covered the 1,000-mile trail in 25 days, finishing in Nome shortly after midnight. Out of the eight attempting to make it to Nome, only one other finished, Italian Marco Berni. Berni also walked the trail to Nome, finishing a few days after Hewitt

It would seem unusual if the Seward Peninsula were to see a year go by without someone trying to traverse the Bering Strait by one odd method or another. More often than not, the attempts call for the unlucky adventurer or adventurers to be plucked from the frigid sea by rescuers. Such was the case this year for Jean-Gabriel Chelala, a French citizen attempting to circumnavigate the globe under his own power.

Chelala had already paddle-boated across the Atlantic and biked from Florida to Alaska before making his attempt to kayak across the Bering Sea and continue his journey through Asia. Suffering from hypothermia, Chelala was hoisted from the sea by a Coast Guard helicopter over the

Another traveler met nearly the same fate a few days later. Norwegian Audun Nordhus was rowing his boat near Little Diomede when weather blew him off course. Nordhus had started his journey in Teller July 3 with both his craft and supplies looking to be no match for the waters in which he was about to journey.

After being lifted from the churning Bering Sea by helicopters, both were taken to Nome. Chelala went on to continue his voyage, arriving in Paris Dec. 12. Nordhus went home to Norway soon after his rescue.

The 18 turbines spent much of the year idled by a manufacturing default. As the year ended, the project was again running and an agreement was ironed out between Nome Joint Utility System and Banner Wind.

HEADS UP-Jeremy Head of the Nanooks is up for a dunk in a game against the Kotzebue Huskies in the Anchorage Christian School tournament on Thursday.

Nome notches big wins, one loss in Anchorage

The Nanook boys basketball squad rang in the new year by blasting their way past their hosts to claim a win in the consolation bracket of the Anchorage Christian School Tournament Jan. 2.

Led by Jeremy Head's 32 points, 19 of which came in the first quarter, Nome handily dispatched the Lions in a 77-49 game Saturday night. Tim Sullivan and Christian Leckband also put up double-digit efforts, each scoring 13 to contribute to the win.

The Nanooks' route to the consolation game was handed to them by perennial challenger Barrow on the first day of the year. The Whalers jumped out to a 22-7 lead in the first quarter. Despite narrowing the gap, Nome was never able to regain the ground in the 66-57 loss. Head again led the Nanooks with 23 points and 10 rebounds. Leckband notched 11 points in the game where he saw little play time due to foul trouble. The loss was Nome's first of the year. Last season, Nome edged out Barrow to take the regional conference title.

The Nanooks started the tournament with the subtlety of a hurricane, plowing over Kotzebue in a 91-20 victory Dec. 31. Head scored 30, Leckband added 16 points and Derek Weiler scored 12. The Huskies will be bracing for the Nanooks' arrival in Kotzebue this weekend for a set of games Friday and Saturday.

OFFENSIVE STANCE AGAINST TWO VIKINGS-Renee Lammer takes a stance as she is teamed against by the Petersburg Vikings at the Anchorage Christian School Tournament.

Trip to Anchorage nets Lady Nanooks one win

The Lady Nanooks basketball team rang in the new year with three days of hoops in the big city during the annual Anchorage Christian School tournament.

Nome with 1 for 3 in the holiday tournament, bested the host's junior varsity team while falling to Petersburg and Valdez.

The Lady Nanooks started off on the right foot Dec. 31, taking an eight-point lead into the locker room against Valdez. The Lady Bucs, however, came back strong, outscoring Nome 28-11 in the second half to grab the 46-37 win. Hillary Stiles led the Nanooks with 13 points, backed up by Richelle Horner who chipped in 11. The charity line proved to be a stumbling block for the Lady Nanooks as they were only able to score 7 point on 24 free-throw attempts.

Nome's first game of the new year also came up a loss as Petersburg outscored Nome 41-32. Devynn Johnson led the Lady Nanooks with 11 points while Stiles added 8.

The Lady Nanooks were able to finish the tourney on a positive note as the team came together to best the ACS JV squad 46-40. Johnson again notched 11 points and grabbed 18 boards to lead Nome. Iris Warnke-Green gave a double-digit effort with 10 points and Renee Lammer added 9. The win improved Nome's record

The Lady Nanooks will play at home this weekend, hosting Kotzebue Friday and Saturday.

BLUE MOON WITH A WILD STREAK—December 31, 2009 yielded a blue moon, the source of the phrase—once in a blue moon. Swanberg Dredge is lighted by one set of headlights as another car streaks by, leaving its mark (the red streak across the photo). A blue moon is the second of two full moons occurring in one month, allowing for the year to have 13 full moons, and this happens every three years.

Cinnamon rolls and kuupiaq in Unalakleet

By Laurie McNicholas

Karen Erickson's cinnamon rolls are twice the size of most, with a home-baked texture and flavor rarely found in a restaurant or bakery. They draw eager customers to her new business in Unalakleet—Kuupiaq (coffee) House.

"I usually go through two dozen cinnamon rolls a day when I make them—at least twice a week," Karen said. They are available with or without frosting. "I carry muffins, cookies, sometimes donuts too, all made from scratch," she added.

Karen concocts her customers' favorite hot espresso beverages, including lattes, cappuccinos, breves, sludges, americanos and mochas. She also offers frappachinos, a blend of coffee, ice and milk; and smoothies, concentrated fruit flavors blended with ice.

Kuupiaq House is located in a small building in midtown near the post office and across the street from the Unalakleet Schools and offices of the Bering Strait School District. A small dining area with a couch and two tall, round tables, each with three stools provides limited seating. Customers pick up their orders at a counter between the dining area and kitchen.

"A few regulars come in and sit, but we receive call-in orders from the school district and frequent customers in town," Karen said. Groups of hungry high school students pop in from time to time. She also prepares baked goods to order for meetings and other special events.

"We started business in March 2008 at the start of the Iditarod Sled Dog Race," Karen recalled. "We were so busy." Later that year Kuupiaq House won a Small Business Initiative grant of $14,500 from Norton Sound Economic Development Corp.

Karen's husband, Karl, an Alaska State Trooper, sometimes mans the Kuupiaq House counter during his off-hours. Both were raised in Unalakleet but lived for years in other communities where Karl served as a Trooper—Anchorage, Glennallen, Soldotna and Kotzebue.

"We've been back in Unalakleet only four years," Karen noted. "It's nice to come home. Our kids love it." Their kids are daughter Katiya, 17, a senior at Frank A. Degnan High School; and sons Donald, 15; Kadyn, 10; and Kael, 5. Karen said Katiya and Donald often run the coffee shop when she and Karl are not available.

Karen hopes to expand Kuupiaq House in the future. "I would love to make it into a soup and sandwich and chili spot," she said.

Coffee: how healthy is your morning cup?

Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

If you are drinking a cup of coffee while reading the paper today, pour yourself another cup. This ancient beverage is likely good for your health.

Most people know coffee provides a temporary boost in mental acuity and energy, primarily due to caffeine. Research over the last 20 years shows that coffee consumption may also have long-term health benefits. At higher doses, coffee reduces a person's risk of acquiring type II diabetes, Parkinson's disease, liver cancer, colon cancer, and dental cavities. Sometimes coffee is used to treat migraine headaches and even asthma.

The most recent research on coffee involves its effect on prostate cancer. Men who drink coffee have a lower risk of acquiring an invasive form of prostate cancer, according to recent data reviewed by a group of Harvard epidemiologists. These scientists followed a cohort of 50,000 men over 20 years and found that men who consumed more than 36 ounces of coffee daily lowered their risk of acquiring invasive prostate cancer by 60% compared with men who do not drink coffee.

Thirty-six ounces per day, about 6 small cups, seems to be the dose of coffee at which researchers find the greatest long-term health benefits. For example, according to research out of the Harvard School of Public health published in the Annals of Internal Medicine in 2004, one to two cups of coffee a day will lower a person's risk of developing type II diabetes by a few points, but at 6 cups a day, men reduce their risk of type II diabetes by over 50 percent, and women who drink six or more cups a day lower their risk by nearly 30 percent. Decaffeinated coffee has beneficial effects as well, but the effect is much less profound compared to caffeinated coffee.

Despite the positive research, doctors are reluctant to recommend daily coffee, especially at higher doses, out of concern for coffee's harmful effects. Coffee can exacerbate symptoms of gastritis or gastric ulcers, especially in smokers. Higher doses of coffee are associated with a slight increased risk of osteoporosis in women; (though this effect is mitigated by a glass of milk daily).

Coffee's effect on the cardiovascular system is mixed. Coffee causes a small elevation in cholesterol levels and can strain an unhealthy heart by temporarily increasing the heart rate and blood pressure. These harmful effects are balanced by the positive effects of heart-healthy antioxidants, which are highly concentrated in coffee. According to research published in the journal Circulation early in 2009, coffee consumption is associated with a lower risk of stroke in otherwise healthy individuals. The American Heart Association has found no clear adverse effects to moderate coffee consumption defined as one to two cups per day.

It is important to point out that the healthy aspects of coffee do not overcome the unhealthy ingredients in many specialty drinks. Saying that coffee makes a double tall mocha healthy would be like saying that apples make apple pie good for you. In both cases any health benefits are purely social.

Taking your coffee black may sound old-fashioned, but when consumed daily, drinking your coffee plain or adding only a little milk likely offers the greatest benefit to your health. Of course you can still have fun with the order. Ask for a "single tall skinny drip without the whip" and be well.

Karen Anaquta Mae Iva

Iya
May 28, 1959 – December 2, 2009
Anaay was born May 28, 1959 and raised in Savoonga by Nathaniel and Cora Iya.

Anaay loved living in Savoonga and lived with whom she called Muffy her "Mom." She had a passion for Eskimo Dancing and excelled in dancing so much that the audience would start to get excited even before she began to dance. The singers loved to sing for her.

She enjoyed eating traditional food and loved storing food. She was a Teacher-Aide at the Hogarth Kingeekuk Memorial School for many years because she loved working with children. When Qemiq was born, she automatically adopted him as her son. Their bond was always visible and very enjoyable to watch.

Anaay helped to raise Ukaaka, Koni and Barry. She baby-sat a lot of other nieces, nephews and other children. She loved playing cards, especially "Snitners," watching movies, reading books or riding around on a four-wheeler with Qemiq and teasing her friends. Anaay made an extra effort to make sure you knew her because it was meant to be a friend for life; thus the teasing was always present.

Anaay is survived by sister Agnes Immingan and brother James Iya, Jeanette "Muffy" Iya and her family, Gordan Iya's family, Davis Mokiyk and family, Veronica Iya and her family, nephews Joseph, Jr., Jason, Jade, Barry and niece Bernadette as well as many other nieces, nephews, and numerous relatives and friends.

She was preceded in death by her parents Nathaniel and Cora Iya, brothers Harvey, Edgar, Gordan, Joseph Sr., and Matthew Iya; her sisters Elizabeth and Joan.

Anaay had many other relatives in Gambell, Nome, Anchorage, Portland, Michigan and other points beyond. She had friends from Barrow to Juneau, and Boston, MA to Portland, Oregon. Qemiq said that she is our guardian angel now and will always be close to our heart.

Qemiq (and family) would like to express our gratitude and thanks for all who helped in the time of our need, for your prayers, comfort, food, flowers and especially your support. God Bless you all.

We all thank everyone for cards, food, flowers, spiritual and physical donations (making casket and cross). Your thoughtfulness has made a difference in the sorrow our family felt.

Thank you for remembering her. With all our thanks and God Bless!

Muffy, Jason, Joe Jr., Ukaaka, Qemiq (Anaay's son), Koni and Barry Iya.

James Minor Walsh

James Minor Walsh, born in Nome on December 22, 1916, died December 14, 2009 in Seattle. He was fourth of 10 children born to Michael Walsh and Louise Forsythe Walsh. Jim received his BA from the University of Alaska in Fairbanks, and taught elementary school in Nome and Seldovia, interrupted by his enlistment in the US Army.

Following the end of WWII he returned to Alaska, where he met and in 1946 married Elizabeth Petry, his beloved Betty. They celebrated their 62nd anniversary in October 2008, and she passed away the following February.

Jim worked as station manager for Pan American Airways in Nome, and later in Ketchikan. During these years 10 children were born to the couple. In 1966 the family moved to Seattle where Jim continued to work for Pan Am will his retirement in 1977.

For the next several years, he worked for a variety of travel organizations and for Alaska Magazine, writing several articles and consulting on a book about Nome. His work enable him to explore the world and it was a delight for him to be able to share this opportunity with his family. Soviet Russia, China and Afghanistan were only a few of the countries he visited.

Jim's life was one of profound dedication to his family and his community. He was active in the Chamber of Commerce, the Irish American Heritage Club, rotary, Alaska Yukon Pioneers, and the Democratic party, helping to nominate John Kennedy at the 1960 national convention. He loved learning, he loved language, and above all he loved a good story. True adventures from Alaska's remarkable history, tall tales from poet Robert Service, and shaggy dog stories. Jim recited them all with relish and a twinkle in his eye. "Top o' the morning" greeted all who called, day or night. And he sang constantly. From working as a volunteer fire fighter to playing Santa for the neighborhood kids, to preparing food for a church dinner for the needy. Jim was always ready to pitch in, and never forgot to count his blessings.

Jim is survived and remembered lovingly by his sisters Eileen Taylor, Noreen Wills, and Kay Farley, his children Mary T. Jones, Elizabeth A. Walsh (Jim), Nora L. Walsh, J. Timothy Walsh (Diane), Eileen F. Walsh (Gee), C. Erin Walsh (Mike), James D. Walsh (Kathy), Michael B.

Saying it Sincerely

By Fr. Ross Tozzi St Joseph Catholic Church For the Nome Ministerial Association

If you want to cultivate peace, protect creation

Grace to you and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. (Romans 1:7). The start of a New Year is a time when many make and soon break New Year's resolutions. In the Catholic Church, the start of a new year is a time when we gather to pray for world peace. The tradition began in 1968 when Pope Paul VI, the Bishop of Rome, invited the world and not simply Catholics to pray for peace.

Forty-two years ago, Paul VI explained that threats to peace include self-ishness, violence, weapons of mass destruction, the spending of national resources for swords rather than plowshares, and the failure to use reason to settle international differences. In the past four decades we have seen progress in world peace, the collapse of the Iron Curtain, the end of apartheid in South Africa, and peace in Northern Ireland. Sadly, other conflicts rage on and new ones abound. As the young men and women of our region and nation continue to patriotically serve in harm's way in Afghanistan and Iraq, we readily recognize the need to continue to pray for world peace from the traditional threats.

For 2010, Pope Benedict has chosen the theme, If You Want to Cultivate Peace, Protect Creation. He explains, "seeing creation as God's gift to humanity helps us understand our vocation and worth as human beings. With the Psalmist, we can exclaim with wonder: "When I look at your heavens, the work of your hands, the moon and the stars which you have established; what is man that you are mindful of him, and the son of man that you care for him?" (Ps 8:4-5). Contemplating the beauty of creation inspires us to recognize the love of the Creator, that love which "moves the sun and the other stars"."

God has blessed us richly and entrusted the earth to us as stewards. Certainly as stewards of the Seward Peninsula, there is much that we can do:

• Local efforts of the Banner Wind Farm and the desire to offer this technology throughout the region offer great promise. Reduced energy bills and a decreasing reliance on diesel cannot help but protect our local share of creation.

• Mining offers needed jobs for today. Environmentally sensitive mining provides for the stewardship of the land and its preservation for generations to

• Cleanup of the PCB contamination at the old U.S. Air Force site atop Anvil Mountain has been a longstanding concern. Will the contamination threat from our recent past, help us to be more thoughtful as we build for tomorrow?
• For thousands of generations, local hunters and fishermen have shown great care for God's creation as they provided for their families and the local community. The values and skills of past generations carefully taught, accepted, and passed on cultivate peace and help to care for creation.

Each January 1st is the official World Day of Peace. Gathering on one day to pray for peace is not enough. Peace is a prayer that should resonate in our hearts and minds all year long.

Alaskan refiners caught price gouging

A legislative research report shows that price gouging by Alaska's refiners has continued and that the refiner margin in Alaska is twice the national average. The Legislative Research Services Division report conclusively shows that price gouging by Alaskan refiners has continued unabated. Sen. Bill Wielechowski, D-Anchorage, estimates that refiner price gouging has cost Alaskans over $189 million. Wielechowski said that during the last legislative session legislators were assured by a Tesoro representative that Alaskan gasoline prices were merely lagging behind those of the lower 48, and that they would soon come down. The newly released report's charts show that the refiners have continued to jack up the price of gas, although the price of crude oil has gone down. The refiner margin is very roughly the profit earnings, plus some costs, for a refiner. Tesoro and Flint Hills Refiners provide virtually all the refined gasoline for Alaska, with Tesoro dominating the gasoline refining, with over 80 percent of the market.

According to the American Automobile Association, Alaska still has the highest gasoline prices in the nation today. When the price of oil spiked in the summer of 2008, Alaskan refiner margins exploded to $1.45 per gallon by October 2008, while the Washington and US average refiner margin peaked at 60 and 63 cents, respectively, in September 2008. In November 2008, the Washington and US average refiner margins hovered at around 10 cents per gallon, while Alaska's refiner margin remained over 10 times higher, at $1.17 per gallon. As the Legislature debated price gouging bills over Tesoro's and Flint Hills' strong objections, the refiner margin difference narrowed.

Taking the historical averages, Wielechowski estimates that Alaskans have been overcharged an average of 54 cents per gallon. He pushes for passage of Senate Bill 54, which would outlaw price gouging on gasoline and other fuels in Alaska.

AT&T grants BSSD $50K toward dropout prevention

The Bering Strait School District has received a $50,000 grant from AT&T to help fund drop-out prevention programs. The funds come from a four-year, $100 million national commitment by the company to fund high school success and work force readiness initiatives.

Bering Strait was one of two districts in the state to receive the $50,000 gift. The Anchorage School District netted the other grant. "This significant donation from AT&T will go a long way toward helping at-risk students graduate and go on to a successful work life or higher education," said BSSD Superintendent Jim Hickerson in a press release

The funds are part of AT&T's Aspire program, which includes grants to schools and nonprofits, student job shadowing, national research and community dropout prevention summits. "The success of our youth affects us all-from the students themselves to our need for an educated workforce," said Mike Felix, president of AT&T Alaska. "With this program, we're helping Alaska school districts look for ways to encourage students to stay motivated to graduate and to see how their choices today can lead to better futures.'

School board votes 3-2 to not renew principal, assistant principal contracts

By Tyler Rhodes

In a move that shocked many within the local school district and community, the Nome Board of Education voted Jan. 12 not to renew the contracts of Nome-Beltz Junior/Senior High School Principal Janeen Sullivan and Assistant Principal Doug Bover.

The 3-2 votes from the five-member board came following a nearly hour-and-a-half, closed-door discussion over the contracts for five administrators. Upon returning to the regular session, the board unceremoniously voted on the five contracts without any discussion.

Board members Gloria Karmun and Barb Nickels voiced the only "ayes" for Sullivan and Boyer with members Kirsten Timbers, Albert McComas and Heather Payenna voting "no."

Frostbitten duo rescued on St. Lawrence Island

Two St. Lawrence Island residents attempting to ride a single snowmachine from Savoonga to Gambell were rescued after being stranded overnight and much of the next day on the trail.

According to Alaska State Trooper Sergeant Andrew Merrill, Cerene Seppilu and Patrick Butler were located around 3 p.m. Jan. 15 on a southern trail between the two villages. Merrill said other than suffering from frostbite and mild hypothermia, the two were found in good condition by a search and rescue team from Savoonga. Merrill said the two were travelling on one snowmachine which had broken down.

Merrill said Seppilu and Butler initially departed Savoonga around 9 p.m. on Jan. 14. Despite a passerby on the trail reporting that they saw the duo around 10:30 p.m., they failed to arrive in Gambell that night. By 11:30 p.m. Seppilu's mother, Veronika James, called the Troopers to report that the party was missing somewhere along the 50-mile route.

According to the Troopers, family members made an initial effort the night of Jan. 14 to find the duo without success. The next day search teams from Gambell, Savoonga and the Troopers began looking for pair. Merrill said teams were first concentrating their efforts on the northern route between the two villages. "The Savoonga team decided to try the southern trail. That team found them," Merrill said.

Merrill credited the search teams on the island for their work. "We would like to thank the Savoonga and Gambell search and rescue teams for their valiant efforts," he said.

Letters -

Dear Editor:

I am writing to express concern and confusion over the Nome School Board's actions in their meeting of Tuesday, January 12, 2010. Major changes were made to the staff at the high school which do not make sense. As an involved parent, I have witnessed the successes of the current high school administration and staff as shown through:

- Good student test scores
- Efficient and effective management of student disciplinary issues
- A flourishing student mentoring program
- Personal parent outreach through Coffee with the Principal
- · Strong, dedicated teachers
- Healthy sports teams and activities
- · Commitment to Rachel's Challenge, an anti-bullying program

With children approaching high school age, I was excited to have these opportunities available for my children. I believe the School Board should be serving the community and parents of our students. There is no need to "fix" what is not broken. Sincerely,

Paula Kennedy Nome, Alaska

Dear Editor,

At the 1/12/10 Nome Public Schools Board meeting a very unsettling event took place. The Board voted 3-2 NOT to offer 2010-2011 school year contracts to Principal Janeen Sullivan and Assistant Principal Doug Boyer. Board members Gloria Karmun and Barb Nickels voted to rehire them; Albert McComas, Heather Payenna, and Kirsten Timbers voted not to rehire. I was not at this meeting and learned of this action the following day. Had I known that this vote was going to take place I certainly would have voiced my support for the rehiring of these two fine administrators, but like the rest of my colleagues, this came as a complete surprise.

This vote is disturbing and bizarre. First, no reason was given for the decapitation of the Nome-Beltz Administration; none. Second, short of being a secret decision, it was at the very least made as covertly as possible. Third, I am unaware of any effort by the board to solicit opinions of those most directly affected by their decision, the students and staff of Nome-Beltz.

Had I the opportunity to challenge a pending decision of this magnitude would have argued the following:

- In my six years of teaching at Nome-Beltz, I have had three different principals and assistant principals; an unstable situation that appeared to be rectified with the current administration that has been at the helm for two years. Mrs. Sullivan, along with her husband, Dan, have been part of the school and the community for 20 years. Mr. Boyer has been here for two years and has shown commitment and has implemented long-term plans for school improvement.
- The atmosphere at the school has improved tremendously over the past two years. Attitude among the students and staff has become warm and productive. The administration has held students and staff alike accountable, all the while doing everything they could to encourage achievement.

- In my 12 years of teaching I have never seen a duo that worked so hard, and have worked so well together. I arrive at work and check my e-mail first thing and often find messages from them that were composed late the previous night or earlier that same morning. They are at work while I am asleep.
- •The current administration is the most visible I have ever had the pleasure to work with. They are in the halls, classrooms and cafeteria, and attend nearly all extra-curricular events, on duty and off.
- Finally, these are good people, the kind you can entrust your children to for one of the most important phases of their lives.

I would be remiss if I did not relate to the community what effect this decision has had on NomeBeltz. The teachers have recovered from their initial shock and have sent a petition to the board. The students likewise have organized a petition in support of the administration. However, there is anger and confusion here as well. Unfortunately, there are also some of us questioning our careers in Nome under a board that can so arbitrarily get it so undeniably WRONG.

Sincerely, David Kenney

Dear Editor,

Well, the Loony Season is upon us you know that time between the end of the holidays and the Iditarod. Its arrival is always signaled by the appearance of Keith Andrews' sculpture on the Bering Sea ice. This year, his UFO theme is certainly appropriate given the actions of "our" school board last week. Loony, indeed!

Editorial

Recall! Recall! Recall!

Three members of the Nome School Board should be recalled. Recall is a harsh measure, but it is an effective tool to rid the board of members who abuse power to carry out personal vendettas and make irresponsible and capricious decisions that impact our schools. The actions of board members Albert McComas, Kirsten Timbers and Heather Payenna are unconscionable.

It seems that the reason for their action goes back a few years to some unspecified transgression. What a lasting legacy for a board member who plans to retire and leave town this spring. The two women who agreed with him need a lesson in responsibility and independent decision making. Of course these three should not get all the blame for the chicken manure. The citizens of this town did not step up to the plate and run for office, nor did they turn out at the polls on Election Day.

Being on the school board is time consuming and often thankless, but if a person can't dedicate themselves to the job, they should resign before the public has to put together a recall petition. Nome is not Peyton Place, Harper Valley, nor is it the setting of the Salem witch-hunt. One wonders if any board member has read The Crucible. Three Nome School board members have taken part in what appears to be a petty vendetta that is an embarrassment to our community. Their action needs to be rescinded and they need to be removed from office. They should not be allowed to do their damage, resign and skip town. – N.L.M.–

Legislature convenes for new session

On Tuesday, January 19, state legislators got back to work in Juneau and had a full plate with impending legislation dealing with the state's energy plan, transportation projects and four bills proposed by Governor Sean Parnell. Making good on his December announcement to crack down on domestic violence and sexual assault, Parnell introduced a bill to prohibit suspended sentences for Alaskans convicted of human trafficking, possession of child pornography or distribution of indecent materials to minors. A second bill proposes bail law revisions, making it harder for felony sexual assault suspects to be released. A third bill proposes procedures for post-conviction DNA testing, requiring police departments, courts and state agencies to retain DNA evidence for postconviction testing and cold case prosecution. Parnell also proposes $75 million in funding for a new Anchorage crime lab.

Parnell also proposed legislation to suspend the motor fuel tax for two years. The suspension would apply to gasoline, diesel, marine fuel and aviation fuel. The tax was suspended as part of an energy assistance bill in 2008 and ran out in September 2009. Parnell also proposed to amend the way the state taxes and gives incentives to oil and gas developers. This already has drawn fire from both sides as some say his proposals don't go far enough to court the oil and gas industry, while others don't feel that oil and gas need less tax and more incentives to conduct business in Alaska.

Baker wins Kusko 300

Kotzebue musher John Baker won the infamous Kuskokwim 300 sled dog race. Known for its brutal and unpredictable weather conditions. the Kusko this year dished out - 60°F wind chills. Baker won the event for the first time and took home $20,000, beating second place Martin Buser by one hour and third place Lance Mackey by two hours to the finish line. Thirteen teams competed in this year's Kusko 300. Mitch Seavey was forced to scratch when he froze his eyeballs after 13 hours into the race. The remaining 11 mushers including Paul Gebhard, Mike Williams, Ramey Smyth and Quinn Iten had arrived as of press time, with Unalakleet's Middy Johnson still out on the trail as of Monday evening.

State can side with Shell in lawsuit

The State of Alaska has been granted the right to intervene in a case in the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals concerning plans by Shell to proceed with exploration for oil. Several groups including the Alaska Eskimo Whaling Commission and the Inupiat Community of the Arctic Slope submitted appeals to overturn Shell's drilling plan in the Beaufort Sea. The groups claim that the Mineral Management Service did not properly evaluate the effects of the proposed drilling, including the risk of an oil spill. The state's AG Dan Sullivan said that MMS did adequately evaluate this and that the Parnell administration's interest is to foster resource development and promote job growth.

US Secretary Locke declares federal fisheries disaster for Yukon kings

Secretary of Commerce Garv Locke last week declared that a disaster has occurred with the 2009 Yukon River chinook salmon run, opening the door for federal aid to the area. The federal disaster declaration is in response to requests made by the Association of Village Council Presidents, the Alaska Federation of Natives and Alaska governor Sean Parnell. The request detailed the biological and economic situation on the Yukon River and the impacts of the reduced chinook runs. The declaration does not bring immediate aid to the affected area. The congressional delegation must still secure federal aid. These funds could be used for relief programs, stock research, training programs, fisheries infrastructure or other regional projects.

Alaska PFD in paper form

While a great number of Alaskans file for their annual Permanent Fund Dividend via the Internet, those wishing to earn their money the old fashioned way can still do so by filling out paper applications.

While still an option, the availability of paper applications is more limited than in the past. The Nome Legislative Information Office is the only distribution point in Nome for the paper applications. They can no longer be downloaded from the Internet.

The Nome LIO is located at 103 Front Street, on the first floor of the state building. The office can be found near the east entrance door closest to Subway. Those needing the paper applications or help filling out whichever application is preferred can stop by the office Monday through Friday from 8 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. The Nome LIO can be reached at 443-

Paper applications can also be found at the city offices of most regional villages.

The deadline to file for the PFD is March 31.

Johnson and Federal Programs Coordinator Jon Berkeley were approved unanimously by the board.

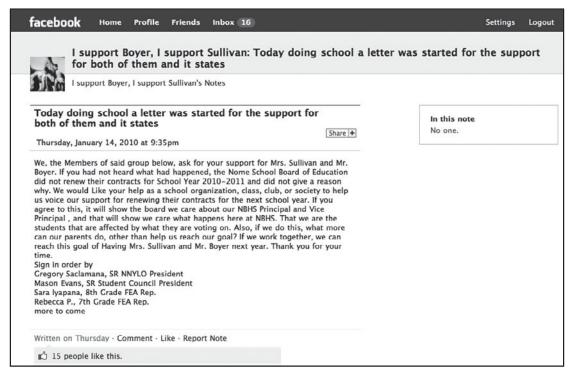

The voting was preceded by a brief statement from Nome Public Schools Superintendent Jon Wehde, recommending that all five contracts be approved. "I am ethically bound to seek the very best person for each job at NPS to the best of my ability," Wehde said in an e-mail to The Nome Nugget. Wehde said he was disappointed with the board's decision.

The proposed contracts for all five administrators cover the 2010-2011 school year. The result of the Jan. 12 vote leaves the principal and assistant principal positions at Nome-Beltz unfilled for next year. According to Wehde, the job openings were posted within the district the next day. "This is standard procedure when an opening occurs,' Wehde wrote.

Five days after that internal posting, Wehde said notice of the job openings are then forwarded to the Alaska Teacher Placement office in Fairbanks. As of the afternoon Jan. 18, Wehde said no applications had been received by his office. There is no rule barring Sullivan and Boyer to reapply for the positions.

Board members who agreed to speak with The Nugget regarding the Jan. 12 meeting would not divulge the reasons behind the ousting of the two administrators, noting that they were unable to discuss what went on in the closed session preceding the vote. Board member Timbers did sav. however, that she had compelling information on which to make her vote to not approve the contracts. "That information was used in good faith in making a tough decision that I stand by," she said, "I also have no hard feelings or vendettas for anybody. I really want to stress that it was a good-faith decision."

Timbers cited student retention when asked if there was a different direction she would like to see the school head or if there was a specific area that, in her opinion, needs improvement. "I would like to see the area of dropout rates addressed and explore ways that we can keep students in our district. Our high-risk kids, what are we doing for them, and how can we keep them in school?" she asked.

ONLINE — A petition drafted by students in support of principal Janeen Sullivan and assistant principal Doug Boyer was posted Jan. 14 on a Facebook page that has drawn in a large number of current and former Nomeites.

McComas also declined to give any specifics behind his vote. When asked if there were areas at Nome-Beltz that he felt needed improvement, he cited what he saw as misplaced priorities. "There needs to be a more concerted effort on academics. I don't think the emphasis has been placed on academics that it needs to be," he said.

Payenna, the recent college graduate who was elected to her seat in a runoff election in November, declined both a phone interview and to answer a set of e-mailed questions for this story.

While Board President Gloria Karmun voted contrary to the majority, she defended the process. "We're a democracy where a majority rules and the decision stands as is," she said. "In the best interest of the full board, the outcome is by majority rule. It's final until, if necessary, it's resolved."

Nickels, who issued the other dissenting vote, used the time allotted for board member comments at the end of the Jan. 12 meeting to express her displeasure with the outcome. "I am extremely disappointed that our board chose not to approve two of our contracts, which is against our superintendent's wishes," she said at the conclusion of the meeting.

Nickels said she was caught off guard by her fellow board members' decision, noting that she had not received any complaints regarding the administration at Nome-Beltz. "I was very surprised that the vote came out as it did, because there had never been any public concerns or administrative concerns addressed publicly at the board level," she said. "I had never heard one complaint about the administration at Nome-Beltz."

In contrast, both Timbers and Mc-Comas said they had heard from people seeking a change in leadership at the junior high and high school prior to the vote. "I hear a lot of things all through the year," McComas said.

Sullivan, who has worked in the district for approximately 20 years after starting as a substitute teacher, is in her third year as principal at Nome-Beltz. Before she took the job, Nome-Beltz went through at least four principals in six years. Bover came to the district two years ago.

Since the Jan. 12 board meeting, all interviewed have received feedback from the public. "I've received e-mails. Many of them are e-mails that are not in favor of the decision," Timbers said, "I've also received personal phone calls at home, many were parents and private citizens who supported the decision, [people] who had no avenue or voice to express that prior to the decision because they felt targeted or signaled out."

Likewise, McComas said he had received feedback from both camps. "I've had a couple who have supported the decision and a couple who didn't," he said.

Superintendent Wehde said, on the balance, most of public sentiment directed to his office has been in support of Sullivan and Boyer. "A recurrent theme in the communications received at my office is that many community members do not agree with the outcome of the vote on the administrative slate of contracts for FY11," he wrote.

Nickels said she has heard from several community members and parents as well. "I have received numerous e-mail and phone calls regarding the recent board decision. My reply to all of them has been to attend the Jan. 26 meeting," she said.

Board President Karmun said she is doing the same. "I know there's community outcry. Folks are welcome to come to our meeting Jan. 26 during the hearing of delegations," she said. "I have been encouraging people to come to our meeting.'

The Jan. 26 meeting starts at 5:30 p.m. at the elementary school. The time for public comment comes right after the meeting's start.

Support voiced from bulletin boards to the web

While the majority of the board's reasoning for why Boyer and Sullivan should no longer serve in their positions is privileged information, those supporting the retention of the administrators have been more vocal. Mass e-mailings, a Facebook page, petitions and postings on bulletin boards all over Nome have called for supporters of the two administrators to rally in their favor and lobby the board members to reverse their decision.

Within a day of the board's decision, a page entitled, "I support Boyer, I support Sullivan," was created on the social networking website Facebook. As of Monday night, the page had 174 "fans," which included a mix of parents, current and former students, teachers and other community members.

Most of the comments on the Facebook page expressed disbelief over the decision and called for a large showing at the Jan. 26 board work session in hopes of persuading the majority of the board to reverse its decision.

Board member Nickels said that while she will go along with the majority's decision, she would personally like to see the public sentiment sway the majority to reconsider offering the contracts. "As a full board member, I do have to abide by the decisions of the board," she said. "As an individual member, I'm still very disappointed and hoping by the public outcry being heard throughout the community, I'm hoping for a board reconsideration of the vote.'

Such was the message one of the several different fliers hung throughout town. A flier headlined, "Save our Principals!" asks supporters to come to the Jan. 26 meeting at Nome Elementary. The flier notes that

Cargo carrier ATS back to its roots as Ryan Air

Going back to its roots, the cargo carrier formerly known as Arctic Transportation Services changed its name back to Ryan Air. The airline's president Wilfred "Boyuck" Ryan made the announcement last week at a company event in Anchorage. "We have operated for just over 10 years as Arctic Transportation Services, but for more than four decades we ran the business under our family name, Ryan," Ryan said. "Moving forward, ATS will now operate as Ryan Air, once again."

Ryan Air had its start in 1953 when Wilfred Ryan Sr. started Unalakleet Air Taxi Services. While Wilfred Ryan Sr. flew all the flights, his wife, Eva, took care of business on the ground. By 1965 Ryan had hired his first pilot and began flying mail routes between Unalakleet, St. Michael, Stebbins and other communities along the lower Yukon River. In the next two decades the company grew.

In 1977, Wilfred Ryan Sr. died and his son, Boyuck, took over the family business and guided its growth from three planes and two pilots to the largest commuter carrier in the state

At its peak Ryan Air was flying to almost 80 destinations and had 400 employees with

In 1996, Ryan Air changed its name to Arctic Transportation Services and provided mainly air cargo and mail services. With last week's announcement, it is ATS no more. Ryan Air remains an all-cargo carrier with 14 aircraft flying out of Unalakleet, Aniak, Bethel, Emmonak, Kotzebue, Nome and St. Mary's, serving 73 villages and employing 90 people.

under Sullivan and Boyer's leadership, the school has seen improved test scores, a sharp reduction in disciplinary issues and the introduction of several programs.

In his correspondence with The Nugget, Wehde backed up some of those claims. "In my December report I shared a recent study from the [assistant principal] on school climate and discipline that reveals continuous improvement in that domain has occurred since the time I left the office of principal five years ago," the superintendent wrote. "... The direction a school takes is a factor of many things, all of which begin and end with student response to our programs, staff and activities. That response has been positive.

"The Nome-Beltz performance profile is stable and one of improvement. As the chief administrator for the board my recent reports to the board all bear out the Nome-Beltz has been responsive to it students and staff and the various inputs from the community, and my directives," Wehde wrote.

Even before the board held its vote, community members stepped up to the podium at the Jan. 12 meeting to voice support for Sullivan and Boyer. Citing a drop in disciplinary referrals at Nome-Beltz and the establishment of programs like Rachel's Challenge to help improve the school's climate, former board member Betsy Brennan advocated for all five contracts to get the green light. "I strongly urge you to follow the recommendations of the superintendent and approve the contracts tonight." Brennan said.

Similarly, Nome Public Schools Librarian Joy Hewitt spoke before the board to ask that all contracts get approved. Specifically, she cited a positive school climate under the current administration. "I love the environment at the high school. I've been there 20 years," Hewitt said. "I give the kids credit. I give the parents credit. But I also give the administration credit."

With all the attention directed at the issue and urging of the public to attend the Jan. 26 board work session, Nickels said she had requested the meeting be held in the elementary school's commons area to accommodate for the anticipated crowd.

Did hoops play a role?

In the absence of a stated reason for not approving the contracts, rumors have floated about as to why the three board members voted the way they did

One more prominent allegation has come from the Nome-Beltz Athletic Director Patrick Callahan. On the night of the decision, Callahan sent an e-mail to approximately 100 recipients, including two at The Nugget, claiming that the move to not approve the contracts was done so in retaliation for the administrators' support of Callahan as the boys basketball head coach. "Please know that we just had our Principal and Vice Principal not re-hired because they support me as the boys basketball coach. This is 100 percent a 4 year old dispute between myself and a players [sic] parent over how much playing time their son received," he wrote. "Had I NOT returned to coaching at anytime over the last 4 years our two best principals at NBHS would not be having their careers trashed at this moment."

While McComas said that he felt he should probably refrain from responding to such a claim, he said it was so far off-base that he felt compelled to address it. "To be honest with you, I think [Callahan] does a good job as head coach," he said. "He's done a lot better job the last two to four years than at the start, but that's to be expected. I don't think I would want to have him removed as the varsity boys head coach.

"[The claim] is untrue because I don't want him out as head coach," McComas said.

Other board members declined to comment directly or at all on the claims. "I am sure whatever statements [Callahan] made were those he felt to be true," Nickels said.

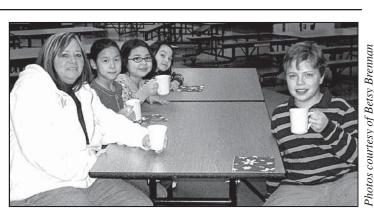

Students use books to circle

On Jan. 12, Nome Elementary School Principal Shari Biscotti treated leaders in the school's "Reading Takes You Around the World" program to hot chocolate and cookies. The program grants students "miles" for the amount of time they spend reading or being read to. The school has a goal of accumulating enough miles to make it around the globe, a trek of 40,000 miles.

the globe

Approximately seven weeks into the program, Biscotti reported to the school board that students had already logged nearly 17,000 miles, with half the school actively participating in the program.

Freeding mushed 2,600 miles on ice as Alaska legislator

From the Archives of the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum

When State Representative Neal Foster traveled to Juneau last week he jumped an Alaska Airlines jet, flew in comfort across skies of Alaska and arrived in Juneau about eight hours later. On the other hand, Conrad Freeding, the first Senator from Nome made the same trip but by dog sled in 1913. It took him two months to get to Juneau.

The following article was included in a scrapbook generously donated by Valerie Roberts, the granddaughter of Conrad and Ida Freeding. Valerie spent five days in Nome researching her family history at the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum. The name of the Chicago newspaper in which this article originally appeared is unknown. However the story is definitely worth publishing again in the pages of The Nome Nugget. Museum notes are italicized in parenthesis.

Senator Here Visiting Brother Tells of a Thrilling Trip at 62 Below Zero. TRAVELS NOME TO JUNEAU

Conrad Freeding Praises His Country and Is Proud of Seward Peninsula Sweepstakes

By dog team 2,600 miles across a land of snow and ice, the thermometer 62 degrees below zero, a blizzard in full swirl— that is how Conrad Freeding, an Alaskan senator, made the journey from Nome to Juneau, the capital of Alaska, when he set forth to attend the first Alaskan legislature (convened March 3, 1913), to which he had been elected a senator from his district. Up in that country the figure of speech must be changed from Jeffersonican simplicity. Viking hardihood— that suggests the thing better.

Senator Freeding is in Chicago today visiting his brother, John Freeding, 5443 East Ravenswood Park, during the holidays, being on his way to Washington to work for the Alaska railroad bill, which provides for the government appropriation of $40,000,000. It is hoped by the Alaskan people that this bill will be up after the currency bill goes through.

"I left Nome two months before the legislature convened last March," he said. "I traveled by dog team down the coast on the frozen edge of the sea, then inland along the Yukon river, and from there down to Juneau. It took two months to make the journey."

Woman Suffrage Bill First to Pass

"In that first session of the first legislature of Alaska we passed the first laws for Alaska in the sixty days of the session. And the woman suffrage law was the first one of all that we passed. I handled it in the senate. In the legislature out there we are trying to keep all politics out—to work for the development of the country. It is a marvelous country, too. You eastern people think of it as one great glacier. We have a beautiful climate—a bit severe at times."

When urged to recount some of his early prospecting experiences, Mr. Freeding said: "I went out in 1898 with 5,000 others, and almost all of them got stranded in the first few months. A few of us penetrated over the Chilcoot Pass, down the Yukon and into the Klondike. Not all prospecting in the Klondike was full of splendor. The first year we had no success and lived on bacon and beans. My partner, Axel Werner a brother of a man in Chicago, and I were almost frozen to death one day in a blizzard.

Saved by a Hunter's Shot

"We had lost our way and were saved by a shot of a gun whistling past us. It came from a hunter not many yards away who thought we were deer. We shouted and he helped us to his cabin nearby. After a year in the Klondike I went to Nome in 1899, then a town of a few hundred people. I had with me 50 cents, five pounds of beans, a pick and a shovel and a tent. On the beach at Nome I cleaned up $1,800 in eighteen days. Well, those days are over. Nome now has 3,000 inhabitants, after having had 35,000 in the booming times of 1900. We have the largest birth rate there in Nome of any city in the world and no criminals. That is a thing we are proud of. And did you ever hear of our Alaskan sweepstakes? It is like the Derby in England: Everybody is interested in them. In April of every year there is a race of dog teams, which lasts five days, when the malamute dogs, half wolf, race from Nome to Candle and back, 202 miles. It is exciting; nobody sleeps on that race. Ten thousand dollars is the prize."

Scams: Accounts Compromised

By Reba Lean

Little Italy hacking hits home. A high per capita online ordering populace could mean trouble for shoppers.

Nome is not known for its overwhelming numbers of credit card thefts, scams or frauds, but the danger still exists even in this small town, and for the rest of Alaska. Typically, the Internet is the source of credit card information thefts. If not wary, users of the web can run straight into traps that often look too good to be true.

Recently, however, Anchorage's Little Italy restaurant was victimized with vehemence. Its credit card machines were apparently picked at random to be hacked, and for about the whole month of December, 500-1,000 credit card numbers were stolen.

"I wasn't alone across the U.S. this season," owner Patricia Gialopsos said of her ordeal, "I was just stunned at the level of it." She did her own research of other credit card theft cases throughout the country, and found "a bunch of Southeastern states tracked it to the Ukraine." Gialopsos said her restaurant may be facing charges from the credit card companies because businesses are usually held responsible in these situations.

Jarrell Davis of Bank of America's Victims Assistance Unit said that at his company, detecting agents go through accounts 24-seven looking for unusual transactions that could be found to be inconsistent charges. Inconsistent charges can tip off the credit card companies that there is some type of fraud occurring. When people become aware that they are victims of fraud, there isn't much to do, except close their current account. Sometimes the companies can assure their customers get their money back, but it depends on the amount taken. With cases such as Little Italy's, Davis said that he understands the business is not at fault, but when so many numbers are taken, he is unsure of what could happen.

Someone's credit card in trooper Sgt. Derek Degraaf's workplace was compromised by the Little Italy hacking. They received a phone call from the credit card company, and sure enough, charges showed up from the East Coast that were not the person's own. Degraaf doubts that Little Italy will be held responsible in the end. "You'd have to be negligent," he said. He said the restaurant would be blamed only if they were knowingly using outdated equipment or software that was disreputable, and though he's not working on the case himself, he doesn't believe they are at fault.

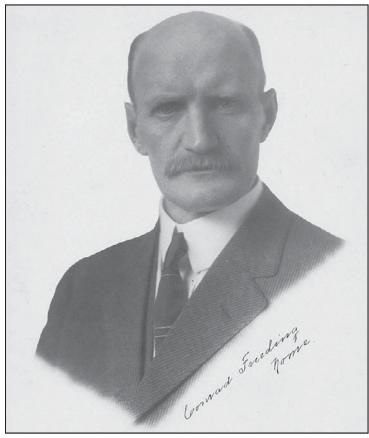

Police Chief John Papasodora has only been in Nome since October, but has already seen a few incidents involving credit card scams. Mostly, he says, they see a lot of hard-item thefts, and a low rate of electronic thefts. He does warn that it might be easier than most think to have their information stolen.

"Guard credit card information closely, and guard identification closely," he says because it is all too easy for someone to snap a picture with their iPhone of a card left on the counter of a grocery store – even for a second.

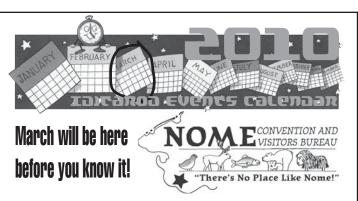

Trooper Andrew Merrill said that he doesn't typically deal with accounts compromised in Nome, but does in the villages. Most cases he has seen have been the misuse of credit cards. Sometimes people will be given a city or tribal credit card, and "they'll go to town using it for personal use." What the blue collar unit is not equipped to answer here in Nome, they send to the white collar unit in Anchorage. Sgt. Degraaf deals with computer and financial scams all over Alaska.

"People are getting scammed all the time," he said. Most cases he sees are when people order online from eBay or Craig's List and don't receive what they thought they would, or anything at all. He recommends using an in-between payment method, like PayPal. The problem with a large number of cases he deals with is that they occur out of his jurisdiction. It is often difficult to coordinate with crime units in the lower 48, especially because they are not near the victim.

He hopes that people will report their incidents, if not to the police or troopers, to a website called the Internet Crime Complaint Center at www.ic3.gov. The website involves the FBI, the National White Collar Crime Center, and the Bureau of Justice Assistance. The website allows users to report complaints, and gives internet crime preventions tips.

State of Alaska comments on health care reform

As the US House and Senate continue to hammer out final language of the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act as the sweeping national health care reform is named, Republican governors including Alaska's Governor Sean Parnell sent out a letter to US Senate majority leader Harry Reid, house speaker Nancy Pelosi and minority leaders Mitch McConnell and John Boehner calling the health care reform bills "a lost opportunity to improve the lives of Americans." Parnell said in the letter that while 15 to 20 million more people would be covered under Medicaid, "this entitlement expansion" would shift the cost to those who are privately insured. The letter complains about a lack of transparency of the process and warns against hastily preparing partisan legislation that would omit reform and "saddle American taxpayers for generations to come.3

The letter was signed by 20 Republican governors. On Christmas Eve, the Senate passed their version of the health care bill along party lines. Republican Senator Lisa Murkowski voted against it, Democratic Senator Mark Begich voted for the reform. Murkowski alleged that the bill was written in secret, behind the closed doors of the majority leader's office and that the partisan bill would increase the role of the federal government in health care, worsen conditions for Medicare patients, raise taxes and insurance premiums and in all would do nothing to bend down the cost curve. However, Sen. Begich said that he supported the bill because the status quo of health care is not acceptable. He argued that the legislation would end discrimination for pre-existing conditions and would end discrimination based on gender. Begich said it would prevent insurance companies from dropping coverage if people get sick and would extend solvency of the Medicare trust fund by an additional 10 years while cutting waste, fraud, and abuse in Medicare.

The Democrat said the bill would make prescription drugs more affordable and require insurance companies to pay for preventive care. Begich said that Alaskans with health insurance could keep it. "While the thousands of Alaskans who do not have health insurance, or have insurance they can't really afford, will have access to an insurance exchange offering affordable health insurance choices," Begich said in a statement. An estimated 52,000 Alaskans would qualify for tax credits to help purchase affordable health coverage.

"Health insurance costs for Alaska families increased five times faster than wages during the past decade,' said Begich. "If we do nothing, those costs will double again in a few years to about $24,000 — that's 40 percent of the average family budget. The high."

But the State of Alaska and its legal review of the pending health care reform don't agree with the costs involved and provisions included.

In a white paper, the State of Alaska submitted comments to Congress on January 11. The pending reform aims to provide health coverage for everybody, and to prohibit insurers from denying health care coverage due to pre-existing conditions or age. The state commented that this could be problematic for Alaska, because it would drive up the cost of insurance premiums unless there are enough people participating to spread the risk. The health care reform proposes that states establish an insurance exchange where people could compare plans and buy coverage. The state commented that it would prefer an Alaska state-run exchange over a national insurance exchange model.

The health care reform would require people to purchase a minimum basic plan and to levy a tax penalty for those who don't enroll. The Alaska state's position is that this won't go over well with Alaskans as it would translate into a new tax on those who can't afford insurance in the first place. The state's comments also address the workforce, saying that the proposal does not go far enough to develop the health care workforce.

Regarding efforts to stem fraud, waste and abuse of Medicare and Medicaid, the state is concerned that the bills would increase cost to providers which may keep them from participating, further decreasing access to care for Alaskans.

While the state's white paper mostly criticizes the health care reform, it

Reauthorization language. "For the first time, federal law will recognize that tribal services are no longer linked to provision in a facility, but can be provided in the community," the document says. This would allow tribal organizations to provide long-term care services for their tribal members.

Last week, the Alaska Department of Health and Social Services also submitted the Alaska Health Care and the Alaska Legislature. The report concludes that the Alaska health care system has come together in a piecemeal fashion over many decades and that a system this complex could not be fixed over night.

According to the report, the commission wants a health-care system for Alaska that places individual Alaskans and their families at the center of their health care and that fotreating illness and injury. In the report, the commission said that improved access to health care services and affordable health insurance coverage is needed and that costs need to be kept in check by reducing Alaska's medical inflation rate so that it is at least below the national rate. The report also concludes that part of keeping costs down is to focus on prevention.

Obesity predicted to trump smoking as next major health threat

Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

The two most threatening health issues in rural Alaska are tobacco smoking and obesity. Of these two, smoking may soon take a back seat to obesity as the number one cause of preventable illness. According to research published by the Centers for Disease Control in 2004 and confirmed in a subsequent study last month in the New England Journal of Medicine, if current trends continue, obesity in the United States is predicted to cause more disease and unnecessary death than smoking by the year 2020.

In the lower-48, smoking rates have fallen by 20 percent over the last 15 years, thereby improving overall life expectancy, but obesity rates have risen by 48 percent negating many of the positive effects of smoking cessation.

But in rural Alaska where smoking rates have not fallen with national trends, the rise in obesity creates what is in essence a double threat. Since 1991, obesity rates in Alaska have climbed from 13 percent up to 27 percent. Nearly two out of every three Alaskans are now either overweight or obese, according to a summary report published last month by the Department of Health and Social Services.

It is important to understand that the terms "overweight" and "obese" do not merely refer to a person's shape or size, but have very specific meanings in the medical literature. Researchers follow the body mass index (BMI), a ratio of weight to height, to determine a person's risk of developing weight-related health problems. A BMI between 18.5 and 24.9 is considered healthy. A person with a BMI between 24.5 and 29.9, considered overweight, has an increased risk of weight-related problems. A person with a BMI of 30 or above (ex. a 5 foot 10 inch person over 210 lbs.) is defined as medically obese with a clear risk of developing diabetes mellitus, cardiovascular disease, certain cancers, and a wide array of orthopedic problems Maintaining a healthy BMI can be a lifelong challenge for some. But a few basic principles may help make the challenge inviting.

A healthy weight is primarily about a balance of nutrition and physical activity, not simply diet and exercise. Nutrition is about providing the body with healthy calories, not merely restricting calories. While the most sustainable weight loss plans include some form of calorie restriction, the reduction in daily calories does not need to be excessive. Many people find it helpful to log their intake of calories for two weeks and then find ways to lower their daily intake of excess calories by about 10 percent. More importantly, increasing the percentage of calories from fruits, vegetables, nuts, and fish in the diet helps with weight management and overall health.

Likewise, physical activity is about movement, not merely time spent in the gym. Physical activity may include any type of walking throughout the day. A pedometer seems to help many people get the recommended 10,000 steps a day recommended by the American Heart Association. Weight lifting or resistant training can help build muscle. Pound for pound, muscle burns 10 times as many calories as fat tissue.

A person's maximum heart rate is estimated as 220 minus current age. When exercising for weight loss, keeping the heart rate at only 70 percent of this predicted maximum rate is most effective because, unlike more strenuous training, the body does not crave sugar to replace the calories used during less intense exercise.

With proper attention to smoking cessation, nutrition, and physical activity, the harmful trends seen in the lower-48 can be avoided here in rural Alaska.

BIG DUNK - Nome's Jeremy Head executes a spinning slam dunk as Point Hope players can only watch during the Thursday game of the 2010 Subway Showdown at Nome-Beltz. Nome won the game 104-73.

Boys rule the roost at Showdown

The Nome boys ruled their home court for the 2010 Nome Subway Showdown, dispatching their three guests in as many nights of play.

The final night of action on Jan. 16 handed the Nanooks their toughest challenge of the tournament in a game against Cordova. The Wolverines nearly erased a 23-point lead Nome had managed to accumulate by the third quarter after a late-game run that put Cordova within seven points. Even without tall-man Christian Leckband on the floor that night due to an injury in Friday's game, Nome was able to hold on for the 59-51 win.

The win was Nome's eighth for the season and the 26th consecutive victory on their home court. Cordova's loss was the team's first of the season.

Jeremy Head was named Showdown Tournament MVP for the third straight year after he scored 24 to lead all scorers in the tourney's final game. Mason Evans added 12 and Cordova was led by Christian Brockert's 23.

In other boys' action on Saturday, Point Hope put up a win against Bethel with a score of 68-57. Ebrulik Frankson scored 16 to lead the Harpooners. Bethel was led by Brodie Smith's 20.

Nome doubled Bethel's score in its win against the Warriors on Friday evening, 82-41. Cordova and Point Hope put on a much closer show that evening with the Cordova boys taking the win 68-65 in overtime.

In the first round of games on Thursday, Nome broke the 100-point threshold against Point Hope. Both teams were hot on the offensive end of the court with the Harpooners scoring 73. Leckband scored 32 points in the win, followed by Head with 27. Adam Sage scored 18 of his team-high 28 points in the second half to lead the Harpooners. Frankson added 18.

Cordova and Bethel played a close game on Thursday with the Cordova team coming from behind down the stretch to take the win 5148. The Wolverines outscored the Warriors 21-12 in the fourth quarter to grab the win. Brockert led Cordova with 16 points, backed up by Dane Meyer's 14. The Warriors were led by Chucky Herman's 15 points.

Besides grabbing the tourney title and MVP honors, Nome also boasted the boys hotshot and three-point competition champion. Tim Sullivan grabbed both those titles. Patrick Hopstad of Bethel was the free-throw champion. Nome's Mason Evans also earned a spot on the all tournament team along with Head. Other all-tournament team members were Sage and Frankson of Point Hope, and Meyer and Brockert of Cordova.

Nome's boys will travel to Anchorage and face Colony High School Jan. 21 at the Dimond Prep Shootout. Nome joins Grace Christian as the only other Class 3A school in the tournament. Other teams playing are Dimond, Soldotna, North Pole, Ketchikan and Kodiak.

After winning the opening round of the 2010 Subway Showdown against Bethel Jan. 14, the Lady Nanooks were unable to gain the upper hand on its opponents the next two nights at home.

The fourth quarter proved critical for Nome in its Thursday win against Bethel. The Nanooks outscored the Warriors 7-2 in the last quarter. That five-point margin determined the win with the final score of 45-40. Liz Luce led Nome with a dozen points, followed by Hilary Stiles and Devynn Johnson who each contributed 10. Charmae Chavez scored 12 to lead the Warriors.

In Thursday's other girls' game, eventual tourney winner Cordova grabbed a comfortable win against Point Hope 69-54. Again another big fourth-quarter effort sealed the win with Cordova outscoring the Harpooners 22-11. Teal Webber scored 18 and Misa Weber added 14 for Cordova. Point Hope was led by Donna Nash's 16, and of Point Hope by a score of 47-41. Cordova kept up its winning ways by squeaking past Bethel 47-44.

Villages, conservation groups challenge Red Dog Mine discharge permit

By Diana Haecker

Alleging deficiencies of a discharge permit issued to the Red Dog Mine, the Native Villages of Kivalina and Point Hope as well as two conservation groups and five Kivalina residents last week have appealed DEC's decision to certify the

The National Pollution Discharge Elimination System permit is - according to the mine's operator Teck Alaska Inc. — their main water discharge permit allowing the release of treated mining waste water into the water system. Teck applied for a new discharge permit as the mine plans to expand mining into the Aqqaluk deposit next to the main pit. The Alaska Department of Environmental Conservation gave the green light to issue the permit on December 15 and the EPA did so on January 8. Last week, the groups filed the appeal.

The IRA councils of the Native Village of Kivalina and Point Hope, the non-profits Alaska Community Action on Toxics and the Northern Alaska Environmental Center, and Kivalina residents Enoch Adams, Jr., Joseph Swan, Sr., Leroy Adams, Andrew Koenig and Jerry Norton joined to appeal the DEC certification of the NPDES permit. They are represented by the non-profit law firms Center on Race, Poverty and the Environment and Trustees for Alaska.

The plaintiffs maintain that the DEC neglected to do its job to safeguard Alaskan's water resources and the health of its citizens and that the permit is not in compliance with the federal Clean Water Act. "This new permit is a license to pollute," said Kivalina resident Enoch Adams in a statement. "While we support economic development, we are also extremely concerned about our drinking water and about the health of Wulik River fish, which are an important source of food for our vil-

According to the plaintiffs, the Red Dog Mine has chronically violated the discharge limits in its current NPDES permit for more than a decade, resulting in the discharge of significant levels of toxic chemicals, including cyanide and ammonia, into Red Dog Creek. Red Dog Creek flows into Ikalukrok Creek and the Wulik River, the source of drinking water for the City of Kivalina.

Teck's spokesman Jim Kulas said in response to the appeal that state and federal agencies just completed a thorough review of Red Dog's water quality issues. Kulas maintained that data shows a healthy downstream environment and that the permit is sufficiently protecting human health and the environment. "Teck believes that the regulatory process has been robust and appropriate," Kulas said. In order to develop the new Aqquluk deposit, Teck needs one more permit issued by the Army Corps of Engineers. Red Dog zinc mine is located on NANA Regional Corporation land, and siding with Teck, NANA's resources manager Rosie Barr said that she hopes the permitting process stays on track "so that the essential economic, cultural and social benefits provided by the mine can con-

Saying It Sincerely

Pastor Mike Christian River of Life Assembly of God for the Nome Ministerial Association "God Is In Control!"

It's a good thing that we never know what a day may bring forth. Life has a way of taking strange turns from time to time. We've all known people who were in the best of health, only to be stricken with a disabling illness or disease. It is not uncommon for men with financial security to lose it overnight. Tragedy and bereavement may hit us right in the midst of a time of happiness in our life.

"When times are good, be happy; but when times are bad; consider: God has made the one as well as the other. Therefore, a man cannot discover anything about his future." — Ecclesiastes 7:14 -

Solomon correctly concluded that both the good days and the bad days of life are under God's control. When things are going well we should rejoice. But if the road of life takes a different turn, we should not allow our joy to turn to bitterness. If we belong to God we are just as much his when the shadows fall as when the sun shines. Our heavenly father has chosen to mingle thorns with roses, clouds with sunshine, and tears with laughter.

If life appears to suddenly be turned upside down, we must not assume that God has turned against us or forsaken us. He is in control of every storm, regardless of its severity. He has drawn an invisible line beyond which the tides of the sea cannot come. And he has promised that the tide of testing will never be more than we can bear. Let our hope always be found in the Lord, our God, not in the conditions that surround us.

"In this you greatly rejoice, though now for a little while you may have had to suffer grief in all kinds of trials. These have come so that your faith of greater worth than gold, which perishes even though refined by fire may be proved genuine and may result in praise, glory and honor when Jesus Christ is revealed." — 1Peter 1:6-7

My friends, although we may not understand why adversity and trials come our way, we must know in our hearts and souls that the Lord is our strength. His love and compassion for us never changes. He will see us through the difficulties if we truly trust and serve him with all our heart, mind, soul and strength. May the Lord bless and keep you in the hollow of his mighty hand!

Blessings to you.

Board voted to not continue the contracts of two of the most respected professionals Nome has seen in the last 12 years. Was there a full moon that night?

I don't even have children in the NPS but have had more than a few occasions to have significant interactions with both Ms. Sullivan, Mr. Boyer, several educators and students while they've been in position at Nome-Beltz. All have been positive. I've called them at home to discuss an issue. They have freely given their off time to help me and to offer assistance. No whining, no sighs, no filtering through caller ID.

They not only followed through, they kept me informed about their progress AND asked for my input.

What more can be asked of administrators of our school system? Wow!

Jana Varrati Nome, AK

Dear Editor:

For those still unaware, on January 12, 2010, the Nome School Board voted to not renew Janeen Sullivan's contract as principal of NBHS. This letter is to inform the citizens of Nome of this tragedy that has taken place, as well as to rally support for Janeen. Twenty years ago, Mrs. Sullivan and I both entered the Nome Public School system, I as a kindergartener, and she as my substitute teacher. I remember giving her a hard time, which was not tolerated. This type of firmness commanded our respect, as students. I also remember one day she brought in a special dessert for the whole class made from chocolate pudding, ground up Oreos, and gummy worms. I couldn't believe it. Why would a substitute teacher take so much of her own time outside school hours to make something for us? This type of kindness earned our love, as students.

Later, as our counselor out at Beltz, it was this same selfless kindness with which she literally left her door open all day long for students to come in and talk to her. She did this not out of duty as our counselor, but as a friend, almost a mother-figure, genuinely interested in our wellbeing. I remember one year we came back from the summer to find she had completely redone her office (at her own expense), so that more of us could fit in there during our lunch hour. Her office was always full of students. I wonder if that's why she always puts in so many extra hours. It's the only time she can get any work done!

Times were turbulent and wrought with instability as I advanced through Junior High. In fact, in my 7th and 8th grade years, alone, we went through four principals (Wolfgang Winter, Sharon Swope, Linnea Baker, and Susan Shears). The latter three all came and went in just one year. We also went through three vice-principals (Scott Otterbacher, Linnea Baker, and Dudley Homelvig), and two superintendents Ligon and

As I advanced into high school, the turmoil continued. My freshman year began with Hannibal Anderson as principal, my sophomore year with Mike Lyngstad, and 2003 began with Jon Wehde. In addition to this administrative turnover, during my class' four years of high school, NBHS had three basketball coaches: Doug Chadwick, who retired after my freshman year, Jason Boerger for the next two years, and finally Pat Callahan, who came on in September of 2003. He continues to serve as our boys' basketball coach, with perhaps the most winning seven year record in NBHS history. Why? Because of the stability he has brought to the program. This is the same stability that Janeen Sullivan has brought to NPS, in general, for the last 20 years—most recently as principal of NBHS.

Now the board has refused to renew her contract. Why? When Albert McComas was questioned, he replied that it was because Nome-Beltz High School is failing. I do not believe this. However, if there was ever a time when NBHS was failing, it was when I was in high school, when we experienced 13 changes in superintendents, principals, and vice principals in just six years. However, even then, NBHS very successfully prepared many of us to make the college transition. I believe the only thing that saved us during this period were the remarkable teachers we had; the one that stands out the most to me is Andre vanDelden. Since my graduation, NBHS has only gotten better. This increase in educational quality has mirrored Janeen's time serving as principal. She has brought much needed stability to a broken system.

I will admit that there may be some statistic out there generated by some standardized test put together by the federal or state government which states that Nome's students are not performing in some areas at a satisfactory level. This has been the case ever since I can remember. With all due respect, to blame this on Mrs. Sullivan is ridiculous. Never before has Nome been blessed with leadership so invested in the community. The Sullivans have made their lives here. Unfortunately, we do not have a specific number or figure for the lives she has changed, and maybe even saved. Nor will we be able to find a number for those she will continue to influence for the bet-

Nome is a great place to grow up. It is a great place to send your children to school. However, Nome is only as great as its people, and Janeen Sullivan is one of the best we have. I do not believe the school board accurately represented our community in their hushed, closeddoor decision last Tuesday. Some damage has been done, but it is not too late to stand up and show our support for someone who has dedicated her life to us. I know there are many of you out there who feel the same way I do. We have the power to reverse this decision. All we need to do is speak with Heather Payenna, Kirsten Timbers, and Albert McComas. They are the three on the school board who voted against Mrs. Sullivan.

Now, when you speak with them, do so respectfully. All three of them are great people trying to do their best to represent us. Sometimes we just need to let them know how we want them to vote. When we speak with them, urge them to call a special meeting to discuss the topic at hand. If enough of us talk with them, they will hold the meeting and we will have our principal back. It is that easy! I also encourage you to call Janeen Sullivan and let her know how much we support her. Thank you for reading this and now please go get this done! It is so easy, but nothing will happen unless we speak up!

ADDRESSING THE BOARD—Nome resident and parent Joe Kennedy addresses the Nome Board of Education Jan. 26 during a three-hour public testimony session over the board's Jan. 12 decision to not renew the contracts of Nome-Beltz Principal Janeen Sullivan and Vice Principal Doug Boyer.

Board to again mull contracts

By Tyler Rhodes

By a showing of three hands in a work session Jan. 26 that followed nearly three hours of public comment, the Nome Board of Education agreed to place the contracts of the two principals at Nome-Beltz Junion/Senior High School on the agenda for the board's Feb. 9 meeting.

The showing of hands—made by board members Gloria Karmun, Kirsten Timbers and Barb Nickels—came after the marathon of public comment voiced by approximately 75 speakers over the board's Jan. 12 decision to not renew the contracts for principal Janeen Sullivan and assistant principal Doug Boyer. Board members Heather Payenna and Albert McComas signaled that they did not wish to again take up the issue.

Karmun, who is board president, pointed out that the district's bylaws do not allow it to act upon a proposal brought before it if it was not already on the agenda. The only official item on the special meeting's agenda was the approval of the district's internet contract, thus any official decision on the con-

City to ask Legislature for funds to build 'Foster Building'

By Laurie McNicholas

The Nome Common Council unanimously approved a resolution asking the Alaska Legislature to provide funding to the city to construct The Richard Foster Building in Nome during a meeting on Monday.

The building would house collections of the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum for which the city is seeking funds to construct a new facility.

Mayor Denise Michels said members of the Legislature suggested The Richard Foster Building concept to the city's lobbyist Wendy Chamberlain when she discussed funding for museum construction with them. Richard Foster represented District 39 in the Alaska House of Representatives for nearly 21 year prior to his death last year.

The resolution noted Foster's special interest in Seward Peninsula history, including its aviation history, adding that he avidly collected items of historical significance and regularly spent time in the state archives researching the history of the region he served and of the state.

The council adopted an amended resolution to move construction of the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum to the top of the city's list of 2010 state legislative priorities. The amendment switched water and sewer infrastructure improvements from first place to second place on the list.

Racing events supported

from Big Lake to Fairbanks via Nome, asked the council to provide the same support for the 2010 Iron Dog as in previous years. She requested use of the city's maintenance shop for participants' snowmobiles, support from the Public Works department for street and race chute preparations, use of City Hall's public address system and web cam, and use of the Mini Convention Center without fee on Feb. 24 for a halfway banquet that is free to the public. Stiles said the 2010 Iron Dog has a 10 percent increase in participation with 29 race teams and 38 recreational riders for a total of 96 racers, six of whom are Nome residents.

Jim West Jr., who was sworn in as the council's newest member at the start of the meeting, moved for approval of Stiles' request and a $5,000 donation from the City as a halfway prize—$3,000 for the first racer to reach Nome and $2,000 for second place. The council approved the motion in a 4-2 vote with Councilmen Stan Andersen and Jerald Brown voting no.

In response to a letter from Kevin Knowlton requesting a donation to the Bering Sea Lions Club for the 2010 Nome Golovin 200 Race scheduled March 13, the council initially approved a contribution of $1,500 from the city. Kevin Bahnke thanked the council and asked for a larger donation because he said the Lions Club is broke and needs the city's help to spon-

High court orders new trial in death of infant

By Sandra L. Medearis

The state Supreme Court has upheld Nome Superior Court Judge Ben Esch's ruling that Frank R. Johnson could have a new trial in determining whether he had criminal responsibility in the death of his 11-month old daughter, Christina.

The infant died after her mother, Johnson's longtime partner, starved her for several months and then dashed her to the floor one weekend in Unalakleet in November 2003.

The Supreme Court's ruling narrowed the requirements for finding a second parent criminally liable for recklessness in not defending a child from harm from the other parent compared to criteria for a second parent's civil responsibility in failing to protect a child. A new trial will ask a jury to decide how remotely possible or reasonably expected an injury must be in relation to risk a parent should have appreciated to determine whether a parent is criminally liable in not protecting a child from the other parent. The Supreme Court added a requirement that an injury not be too remote in likelihood or not be accidental in holding the second parent. The issue is of interest on a broader scale to service agencies acting in place of parents.

The baby's mother, Heather Takak, is serving a prison sentence following a plea deal on charges in the death.

A jury in Unalakleet found Johnson, 31, guilty of manslaughter. Subsequently, in response to Johnson's court filings, Esch denied Johnson an acquittal, but ordered a new trial. Johnson appealed to a higher court that reversed Esch's finding and sent the case back to the trial court for Johnson to be sentenced on the manslaughter verdict. Johnson went to the Alaska Supreme Court. That court released an opinion last week that overturned the appellate court decision and upheld Esch's ruling denying acquittal but granting Johnson a new trial.

According to court documents and testimony during Johnson's trial, Christina died after prolonged abuse by her mother, Johnson's longtime partner. According to testimony in the case, Takak starved Christina to the point where the infant had essentially no fat left in her body. Her muscles had atrophied. One witness testified that Christina looked like a famine victim at the time of her death. The jury found, according to court documents, that the immediate cause of Christina's death was Takak's intentionally dropping the baby on the floor head-first, causing trauma to her skull and brain. This physical assault, which preceded Christina's death by one to three days, caused Christina's brain to hemorrhage and swell inside her skull, leading to her death. Christina weighed 7.7 pounds when she died, just weeks before her first birthday.

The state prosecuted Johnson on second-degree murder premised on a parent's duty to protect his child from physical harm.

The state medical examiner, Franc Fallico, said at the trial that both head trauma and starvation caused the death, and that the head injury would have killed her even if

Letters ·

An Open Letter to the Nome Public Schools Board:

Fourteen years ago I had the good fortune to land a job in Nome at Nome-Beltz Jr/Sr High School. I was hired as the new assistant principal, serving alongside a very popular principal, George Ihly. Shortly after arriving and beginning my tenure in Nome I had the opportunity to begin working closely with the counselor for the junior high, Janeen Sullivan.

What was immediately apparent in working with her was that Janeen, first and foremost, was an advocate for the children of Nome. As I would hope I could say of all of my friends and colleagues, her family comes first but I know that the children past, present, and future - of Nome are a close second for Janeen. As I moved from the assistant principal's position to principal I continued to be impressed with Janeen's dedication to the improvement of education for Nome's children. She was a staunch supporter of mine yet never failed to tell me when something I was contemplating might not be serving the interests of Nome's kids.

I probably see my tenure at Nome-Beltz through rose colored glasses -I think that people generally thought I did a good job – but I realized in the years since I've been away that I am not half the principal that Janeen Sullivan is. She took on a difficult job that involves difficult decisions on a daily basis and that has very few heartfelt rewards. Janeen took this job anyway and has worked tirelessly to ensure that Nome's students have every opportunity to be successful. Now a majority of the school board has chosen not to renew the contract of this excellent administrator, over the recommendation of the superintendent.

It has been reported that the news of this travesty has reached Anchorage. Well, let me assure you that it has gone further than that. It has made it to the furthest reaches of the state and people are aghast. What's more, the real reason for this decision is what is making the rounds across Alaska. If I hadn't seen this type of political action in Nome and elsewhere I would say it couldn't be true, but I have no trouble believing

The reason for this action lies in Janeen Sullivan's unwillingness to bow to the wishes of some powerful members of the community who have wanted for years to dismiss one of your basketball coaches. As it is with almost all coaching issues it comes down to a parent who was/is dissatisfied with the amount of playing time their child received/receives. Whether it's one individual who wants this coach's job or a group of people, what it comes down to for Janeen is to do what is right, and removing this coach is not the right thing to do. Most of the citizens of Nome will find it easy to believe that anything else given as a reason is simply a smoke screen. It never ceases to amaze me that for some people the outcome of a game among teenagers should be used as a political tool for leverage or revenge.

Members of the board: tell it like it is. Do not make your legacy, as board members, that you ran out of town the best principal you ever had. Do what is right. Support your superintendent and the will of the people of Nome by offering contracts to the heart and soul of Nome-Beltz -Janeen Sullivan. You cannot do better than to have her at the helm of that school because she will continue to do what is right, and what is best for the students.

AVEC lowers electricity rates

The Alaska Village Electric Cooperative has surprise news for its customers: starting with their February bills, they'll see the cost of electric power go down by two cents per kilowatt hour. The AVEC board of directors voted on the rate decrease recently. "During 2009, our operating costs declined as we brought new generation online that had been largely built with grant funds," said Meera Kohler, AVEC president and CEO. New wind turbines and new fuel-efficient power plants have helped increase operating efficiency and reduce operating costs. The grant funds used for the windmills and power plant optimizations came from the Denali Commission and from the Rural Utilities Service.

Two cents per kWh is going to trim down AVEC's revenue by $1.4 million per year. AVEC has filed a rate reduction notice with the Regulatory Commission of Alaska and the commission's action to adjust the Power Cost Equalization rate as appropriate is expected shortly.

Alaska Village Electric provides electric power to 53 Alaskan villages and more than 7,500 consumers, including northwestern Alaska communities.

They went rogue

We live in a close tight-knit community. We know the old-timers and the new folks. We take pride in the big heart and ethnic diversity of our small town. Yet, beneath the surface there seems to be a hidden current of long time bad feelings. Apparently there are some deepseated resentments of historic nature with long memories and sharp knives. There are imagined and real reasons, but it's time to move forward and get rid of these feelings.

The Nome School Board has demonstrated uncalled for backbiting and a refusal to let old wounds heal. If we dwell on the past and keep revisiting its failures we are doomed to repeat them. The board has not previously talked about or tried to resolve the unspecified issues. Perhaps they are acting on divine revelation. Only God knows what prompted their actions and she's not talking. Do they get a sadistic pleasure out of perpetuating past problems? What's so sad is that good people are hurt and what is so embarrassing is that good people are perpetuating the hurt that puts our entire community in a bad light.

Three school board members have made a case-in-point. Their backbiting just may turn around and bite them in the butt. They have lashed out for reasons they can't substantiate and have no basis in fact —talk about going rogue! Are they channeling Sarah Palin? Hopefully, sanity will prevail. We are all here together and we must work together to improve the quality of life in our community. Let's shed the past and step brightly into the future. -N.L.M.-

Noorvik in national spotlight as US census starts

On Monday, Noorvik Elder Clifton Jackson was the first person to be counted in the 2010 U.S. Census. Census Bureau Chief Robert Groves personally traveled from Washington, D.C., to Noorvik to launch the count and formally counted Jackson, a World War II veteran and the oldest person residing in the village of 650. On Tuesday, the U.S. Census count started in earnest as trained census workers swarm out to 217 villages in rural Alaska. In other parts of the country the count won't start until April, but the Census bureau wanted to cover rural villages before people leave the villages for subsistence activities.

Norwegian oil company partners with Conoco to drill in Chukchi Sea

Statoil, an international petroleum company with its main headquarters in Norway, entered into a deal with ConocoPhillips to buy a 25 percent working interest in 50 ConocoPhillips leases in the Chukchi Sea. ConocoPhillips would still be operating the leases.

Larry Archibald, ConocoPhillips senior vice president for exploration and business development, said that Statoil's decision to acquire interests in these leases substantiates ConocoPhillips' view that a world-class hydrocarbon potential exists in the Chukchi Sea of Alaska. Statoil and ConocoPhillips have a history of joint operations on the Norwegian continental shelf. However, the head of Statoil's exploration group in North America calls the Chukchi Sea "a new frontier area for all operators." Statoil has already 16 leases in the Chukchi Sea, U.S. Sen, Mark Begich, D-Alaska, commented that the partnership is good news for Alaskans as Statoil's investment reflects the increasing optimism about the presence of significant oil and gas reserves in the Chukchi Sea.

Alaska may see electronic health records soon

Alaska's Medicaid program is

lus funds for a state planning campaign to start an electronic health record incentive program. The program is designed to improve the quality of health care for Alaskans and make their care more efficient.

The electronic records would make it easier for providers who treat a Medicaid patient to coordinate care. For the patient, the electronic records system would make it easier to access the information they need to make decisions about their health care. Alaska will use its federal matching funds for planning activities that include conducting a comprehensive analysis to determine the current status of health information technology activities in the state.

military Begich wants flights over Alaska

According to the magazine Politico, U.S. Sen. Mark Begich is courting the Pentagon, which is now buying more unmanned aircraft than manned jets and planes, to bring all those unmanned aircraft to Alaska. In a speech at a conference on National Security Strategy and Policy Jan. 21, Begich invited the military to use the skies over Alaska to help train personnel to fly Predators, Reapers and Global Hawks. Begich is in his second year on the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Murkowski continues to fight EPA

Last week, U.S. Sen. Lisa Murkowski, R-Alaska, continued her battle with the federal Environmental Protection Agency to regulate greenhouse gas emissions under the Clean Air Act. Murkowski introduced a bipartisan disapproval resolution to stop the EPA from doing so. She managed to gain support from 36 Republicans and three Democrats.

Murkowski said that new regulations would "endanger America's economy," and that she is not comfortable with EPA's actions to find greenhouse gases a health hazard for Americans. She said that the Clean Air Act was written by Congress to regulate criteria pollutants, not greenhouse gases. Murkowski addressed the Senate last week and used a rare measure to block EPA regulators. She submitted a disapproval resolution, which is now referred to the Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works.

If the committee does not favorably report the resolution, the committee may be dismissed if 30 senators sign a petition. Once a disapproval resolution is placed on the Senate calendar, it is subject to expedited consideration on the Senate floor, and not subject to filibuster.

EPA administrator Lisa Jackson said in a statement that Murkowski's disapproval resolution asks each senator to deny the overwhelming science that greenhouse gas pollution is a real and serious threat to the health and welfare of our citizens. Jackson said it disregards the Supreme Court decision that directed the EPA to act and ignores the evidence before our own eyes.

"This resolution, at its core, is not about preventing or postponing regulation, but about denying the established scientific fact that greenhouses threaten the health of our people. It puts politics over science, and it should be rejected," Jackson said.

The core of the dispute is that the EPA is working to limit emissions by large producers of greenhouse gases as part of its compliance with a 2007 U.S. Supreme Court decision requiring the agency to determine whether greenhouse gases endanger the country's health and welfare.

Teacher salary negotiations go into second round

By Tyler Rhodes

On the heels of negotiations that took nearly half a year to set the current salaries of teachers working at Nome Public Schools, the school district and teachers' union find themselves again back at the bargaining table.

After an initial meeting between the two bargaining teams Jan. 19, it appears both sides have some ground to cover if they are to reach consensus on salaries for the next two years. At that first meeting, the Nome Education Association asked for a 7 percent raise for each teacher over the next two years while the district essentially offered 2 percent. "We didn't settle," said Jon Wehde, the district's superintendent and a member of its negotiating team. "The parties have agreed to a second round." That round is slated for Jan. 28.

Normally contracts between the district and teachers cover three years. However, salaries proved to be such a sticking point that negotiations on that aspect, conducted through a federal mediator, only covered the current year. The contract discussions started in February 2009 with the mediated salary agreement not reached until July. The result was essentially a 1.5 percent raise for each teacher.

While other areas of the contract are set through the 2011-2012 school year, salaries for the next two years still need to be hammered out.

To grasp what the district is offering and what the teachers association wants, it is necessary to understand how salaries are calculated in the district. Teachers are paid based on where they land in a grid formed by the number of years they are credited with teaching in the district and the amount of education they have. For Nome Public Schools, under the current contract, a teacher in his or her first year and possessing only a bachelor's degree is paid $41,621. A teacher who has been with the district for a decade and has a master's degree earns $58,382.

The current agreement reflects a 1.5 percent increase from last year for the salaries in each square of that grid. For the next two years, the teachers' association initially requested each of those salaries in the grid increase by 7 percent. The association did not specify how it wanted that 7 percent spread out over the two years.

At the Jan. 19 meeting, the district put three offers on the table for the teachers. The first would have increased each salary in the grid by 1 percent each year for the next two years. The second offer would have taken 1.5 percent of the base salary of $41,621—which amounts to $624 for 2010-2011 and $634 for 2011-2012—and have added those amounts to each salary in the grid. The third offer would have applied a 1 percent raise across the grid for next year and paid an $800 bonus, instead of a raise, for 2011-2012.

Wehde said as the district prepares its offers it has to take into consideration the effect salary raises will have on other items that need to be funded, such as programs, resources and personnel.

The education association's bargaining team—made up of junior high teacher Corey Erikson and elementary school teachers Keith

Conger and Kelly Thrun—reported back to union members that they felt the three options essentially amounted to the same financial offer, and an unpalatable one at that. "Accepting the district's offer would mean that Nome's ability to be competitive in attracting the highest quality teachers would be further eroded," the report reads. "Accepting the district's offer would mean that for the three-year period, including the school years 2009-2010, 2010-2011, and 2011-2012, Nome public school teachers would receive a 3.5 percent increase. As a point of reference, our neighboring school district, Bering Strait, got 5 percent for the 2009-2010 school year alone."

As the union points out, Nome lags behind neighboring districts when it comes to teacher pay. The Bering Strait School District, which includes schools throughout the Norton Sound region, has a starting salary this year of $45,142 compared to Nome's $41,621. Across the pay scale, the Bering Strait School District's teacher salaries outpace Nome's by anywhere from 8 to 12 percent this year. The current BSSD teacher contract calls for 2 percent raises in 2010-2011 and 2011-2012 following the 5 percent raise they received this year.

To the north, the starting salary in the Northwest Arctic Borough School District is $44,223 this year. The district, which includes Kotzebue and 10 other schools, pays between 6 and 17 percent more than Nome this year, depending on where a teacher falls in the salary schedule.

The teachers' union pointed out that even its full request falls short of what other districts have offered their teachers. "It is documented that Nome's entry-level salary is below the state average. And Nome's cost of living is one of the highest in the state. To remain competitive, Nome Education Association's proposal of 7 percent over two years is lower than the precedented [sic] settlements from other education associations around the state," the association's communication to its members reads.

District officials pointed out that a percentage raise applied across the grid of salaries have a much larger impact on those at the top end of the pay scale versus those just starting. For example, the education association's initial request of a 7 percent raise across the board would equate to an increase of $2,913 over the two years for the lowest teacher salary. For a teacher with a decade of experience and a master's degree, the 7 percent increase would equate to $4,128.

Inversely, a raise based upon just a percentage of the base salary—as the district proposed in its second offer—has a larger impact on the smaller salaries. The district's offer of 1.5 percent of the base salary as a raise across the board obviously increases that base salary by 1.5 percent each year. But for the master's-degree-holding teacher with a decade under his belt, that offer would only increase his salary by 1.1 percent. At the top end of the scale, a teacher in her 19th year with a master's degree and 36 additional credit hours, the increase would only equate to a .8 percent bump.

tracts could not be entertained that night.

While most stepping up to the microphones on either side of the Nome Elementary School commons spoke to voice their support for the two administrators, including students, impassioned pleas came from those on both sides of the issue. A majority of those speaking and a showing of hands by nearly all in the room asked to have the 3-2 vote against the contracts rescinded.

Both Sullivan and Boyer indicated at the meeting that they had reapplied for their jobs. Superintendent Jon Wehde said at the meeting's conclusion that those were the only two applications he had received for the positions.

While most school board meetings and work sessions draw fewer than 10 attendees, somewhere in the neighborhood of 300 likely crowded into the commons Tuesday evening. In anticipation of the large turnout, the meeting was moved from its normal location of the library to the large, open room.

It was Payenna, McComas and Timbers who voted Jan. 12 to not renew the contracts with Karmun and Nickels casting the dissenting votes. While the board agreed to put the item on the agenda for the Feb. 9 meeting, it will take a change of heart from at least one of the board members who voted in the majority Jan. 12 to reverse the decision. With Payenna and McComas voting to keep the item off the agenda, it appeared unlikely Tuesday night that they would shift their votes on the contracts.

Plenty in the room that night, however, asked them to do just that. Many who worked in the district or had children in the schools pointed to an improved and safer climate in the school. Several people spoke to the sense of relief at having a consistent administration in place at a school that has seen a long procession of principals and vice principals come and go over the last decade. "Janeen is the first to have lasted this long since my family arrived in Nome. This stability is what I want to see for years to come," said teacher and parent Annie Conger.

"Kicking the legs out from the leadership of this school isn't the worst thing that will ever happen to these guys," said 20-year district veteran Joy Hewitt. "They'll be OK...it's the kids who will suffer."

A handful of parents and community members argued on the contrary that there are kids who have suffered with the current administration at the helm. One parent argued that her son, who needed intensive special education support, was unfairly "railroaded" out of school. "I felt like I was being ambushed by irate members of the district," she said. She added that it took a court order and settlement to get her child back in school.

Other who supported the board's decision noted either family members or acquaintances who felt like there was not enough effort to keep their children at the school. Lucille Evans said more than one of her relatives had left the district after moving here and spending only a short time in the schools. "I'm not sure what's going wrong. I'm hoping that once my children are in high school I'm not going to have to move or ship them away so they can go to high school," she said.

Former Nome-Beltz vice principal Barb Amarok argued there is a distinct population at the high school who is not being served and who is falling through the cracks. "Painting a pretty picture of the high school is denying what is going on. You need to evaluate by what is going on," she said.

Amarok pointed to the number of students obtaining general education degrees instead of their high school diplomas as a sign of students who want to learn but are being driven away from Nome-Beltz. "Our school can build up students to be the best they can be if changes are made," she said.

Others in the vocal minority argued that the board had been voted to their positions by the public and should be trusted to make the right decisions. Payenna's mother, Mo Koezuna, argued forcefully that the vote be respected. She decried what she said were disparaging remarks aimed at Payenna since the Jan. 12 vote. "People have said terrible things...I am disgraced about the horrible things people have said," Koezuna said. "I urge you to stick with your decisions. We voted for you twice, Heather. Stick with your heart. Stick with your decisions."

Still, others spoke who said they worked with the principals through their agencies or organizations noted an increased willingness on the administrators' part to work with them. Bob Froehle from the Nome Youth Facility, Lance Johnson from Nome Community Center and Lance Cannon from Kawerak's Children and Family Services Program all spoke positively of their relationships with the two principals. "I hope that if there's a reason here this evening to at least review this, that you would do so," Johnson said. "I just hate to next year start over again if there's a way to keep it going now."

Several speakers warned that the decision, the reason for which board members have said they cannot discuss, will have a chilling effect on retaining and drawing qualified staff to the district. The argument was made by many who are new to Nome and the district as well as some familiar faces.

Indeed, the theme of wonderment over why the decision was made pervaded a large number of the comments. Speakers argued that perhaps more in the community may be able to stand behind the board's decision, or at least give it more consideration, if they know on what grounds it was made. Some suggested that at the very least the principals should know the reasons behind the move to give them due process. Others said that knowing what the perceived problems are would go a long way in potentially solving them. "If there is something that board members, some parent or community member says needs work, we would like to know it," said high school teacher Erika Eaton. "These are people who can improve if given the opportunity.'

Many pointed out that Superintendent Wehde had recommend the contracts be approved and that it was his job to handle performance issues with the administration. "What I've seen is we've hired a superintendent who seems to have a good idea of what's going on in the district," said community member Matt Tomter. "He's not a storyteller. He's not just going to tell you what you want to hear. I think we had that before, and I didn't like it.

"If you don't like the decisions he's making, hire a new one. But if you hired the guy to make decisions, let him do it," Tomter said.

Among those stepping to the microphones were the two administrators themselves. Both pointed to having never received an unsatisfactory report or unfavorable job performance evaluation from any board member or superintendent. Sullivan noted that parents and administrators are bound to but heads from time to time. "I'm no stranger to conflict in my job and over my job," Sullivan said. "A parent's job is to defend their kids. ... My job is to look out for 250." Sometimes those interests collide, she said.

Sullivan noted that her contract for the current school year was approved unanimously by a board made up largely of the same members. "What has happened since then to change your minds?" she asked.

Sullivan and Boyer both pointed to efforts they have made to improve the school's atmosphere, retain students and bring up academic performance. She also expressed humility. "Nome-Beltz is not perfect. I am not perfect. We have lots of room for growth and I am working on it," she said.

Boyer said despite the last two weeks, he still wanted to remain with the district. "I like the kids of Nome. I like the community," he said. "Everyone is here to do well by the students."

Council

sor the snowmobile race this year. The council upped the city's donation to $5,000.

Bowling alley plan

Matt Tomter and Paul Kosto provided the council with comments and copies of a draft plan developed after a recent meeting among 20 Nomeites who are interested in upgrading, staffing and opening the bowling alley at the Recreation Center.

Tomter quoted cost figures of $40,000 for bowling alley repairs from a recent report by Tom Schemm of Schemm Bowling Inc. Tomter said the dining and lobby area needs new flooring and counter tops, new lighting and paint. He suggested that the city clean up the dining and lobby area and put the restaurant out to bid. The written report he gave to the council estimates the cost of dining and lobby area upgrades at $68,000.

Kosto said the draft plan was generated because someone had to put something on paper to give the city manager and Recreation Center director tools. Tomter said the city has budgeted about $50,000 for a position that could be filled by one person to run the bowling alley for eight hours a day, five days a week. He said the city could charge the restaurant operator an 8 percent fee on gross sales to generate revenue.

"We want to hand this off and say, 'Here you go,'" said Tomter, adding that employees of the city should do the work.

"I think we should step off and let you do it," replied Councilwoman Mary Knodel. She said the bowling alley operation had not worked under city management.

"It did work," Tomter said.

Knodel told Tomter the council has questions and she is not going to argue with him.

Kosto said he had been told the bowling alley was operational when the right person was running it and he is confident it can pay for itself.

Andersen asked City Manager Josie Bahnke if Chip Leeper, director of the Recreation Center, had researched the history of bowling alley operations. Bahnke said he had and they hoped to meet this week. Andersen suggested that Public Works personnel attend the meeting and that bowlers may be willing to help with painting.

Councilman Jon Larson suggested that Leeper prepare a business plan and budget that includes the costs for an employee and equipment repairs. "We already have that put together," Bahnke said.

Other council actions

Council members heard first readings of proposed ordinances to amend the city's FY2010 budgets and scheduled them for second readings, a public hearing and final action at the next regular council meeting. The proposed amendments would increase the FY2010 general fund budget by $106,959 to a total of $10.3 million, decrease the capital projects revenue budget by $1.2 million to a total of $8.5 million; increase the special revenue fund budget by $204,907 to a total of $483,229; increase the Port of Nome fund budget by $136,000 to a total of $4.7 million; and increase the construction capital projects fund budget by $683 to a total of $2.95 million.

In other actions the council:

• adopted a resolution approving amendments to the cooperative participation agreement and bylaws of the Alaska Municipal League Joint Insurance Association Inc., effective July 1, 2010;

• approved by resolution an agreement between the city and Bechtol Planning and Development for professional planning services from Feb. 1 through June 30, 2010 at a cost not to exceed $20,000;

• made no objection to liquor license renewals for the Board of Trade Saloon, Mark's Soap and Suds Bar, Anchor Liquor Store and Anchor Tayern.

Utility manager's report

Utility Manager John Ĥandeland was traveling Monday but sent a written report to the council. He noted that the Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. board of directors has created a Community Energy Fund. Each of the company's member communities is eligible for up to $1 million for installation and construction of upgrades to community power generation and distribution systems, alternative/renewable energy projects and adjustments to power systems that reduce energy costs to rural residents, he said.

"While NJUS had envisioned these funds would be used in the wind program (directly for turbines and project construction), we have identified other needs that would enhance system operation/integration," Handeland wrote. "A potential list of projects has been submitted to NSEDC for their consideration. Subsequent to the initial writing, we have determined the list may need to be adjusted to provide additional cash match for the [Alaska Energy Authority] grant, and other proposed projects removed from the priority consideration."

City manager's report

Josie Bahnke reported that she and Handeland met with representatives of the Department of Transportation and Public Facilities and Alaska Gold on Jan. 14 to review a preliminary acquisition plan for construction of a new 49,000-squarefoot state office building in Nome. She said the plan qualifies as a major subdivision under city regulations.

To move forward with a preliminary plat and acquisition, the DOT/PF asks that the council vacate the Sixth Avenue right of way between Spokane and Steadman Street, Bahnke added. She said the Nome Planning Commission will meet with DOT/PF when it receives an application from the department.

Knodel expressed concern about a plan to move state offices off of Front Street to a residential area. Andersen said he thought the DOT/PF engineer was looking at other locations.

Bahnke said DOT/PF personnel plan to return to Nome in the second week of February to meet with the planning commission and city council. Michels said she had asked DOT/PF personnel to look at a campus style arrangement to use available office space on Front Street.

Nome's 2009 population

The Alaska Department of Commerce, Community and Economic Development has determined that the 2009 population of the City of Nome was 3,486, according to a letter dated Jan. 15 to Michels from Tara Jollie, director, Division of Community and Regional Affairs.

DCCED annually certifies the population of each municipality for use in various financial assistance programs, Jollie explained. She said population estimates are prepared by the state demographer and Department of Labor and Workforce Development. The municipal population figure certified for 2009 is used for FY2011 financial assistance programs.

Executive session

Council members discussed the employment agreement for Bahnke in an executive session following their regular meeting.

Sexual assault case ends with 2 1/2 year sentence

By Tyler Rhodes

In the resolution of a case Nome Superior Court Judge Ben Esch described as a lose-lose-lose situation, a Nome man was ordered to spend 2 1/2 years of a five-year sentence in prison Jan. 21.

After a plea deal, Calvin Gooden, 43, was sentenced to the prison term for the charge of felony attempted sexual assault in the second degree. A more serious charge of second-degree sexual abuse of a minor was dropped in the deal.

In addition to the jail time, Gooden will face five years of probation and be required to file as a sex offender, among other conditions. He reported to prison Jan. 22.

Gooden was initially charged in March 2009 with one count of first-degree sexual assault and one count of second-degree sexual abuse of a minor. According to the Nome Police Department at the time, a juvenile victim came to the department to report a sexual assault. The charges levied against Gooden before the deal pertained to a victim between the ages of 13 and 15.

Gooden and the victim knew each other before the incident which was described as a "spur of the moment" offense that Esch said ended when the victim asked Gooden to stop.

Through the plea deal, Gooden was facing a two- to three-year sentence.

His attorney, Connor Thomas, sought the shorter sentence while District Attorney John Earthman asked for the three years. Before Judge Esch Jan. 21, Earthman argued that even with the maximum sentence in the deal, Gooden would be getting off lightly. "He's got the break of a lifetime as far as the state is concerned," Earthman said.

Earthman also noted Gooden's good job history, family support and lack of any prior criminal record of note. "That's why this case came as such a surprise," Earthman told Esch.

Thomas described the case as a "tragic situation," one in which a man who had no real trouble with the law for more than 40 years has now lost his job and is going to jail, leaving behind the family he supports. Thomas also pointed out that his client will have to register as a sex offender and, being a convicted felon, will not be able to possess a firearm, which will impact his role as an active subsistence hunter.

Gooden spoke for himself at the hearing, saying he took responsibility and apologized for what he had done. He also acknowledged the support he has received from friends and family.

In pronouncing his sentence, Esch noted that Gooden has received substantial support from family and community members, and acknowledged that Gooden had expressed remorse and apologized to the victim. The judge also scolded Gooden, saying he continued to lay blame on the victim by claiming some sort of conduct she exhibited led to the offense. "I don't think there's an appreciation for the consequences that sexual abuse have for the victims," Esch said.

After handing down the sentence, Esch noted that the case posed hardship for all involved. "I've got to shake my head and wonder how something like this ever took place. This is a situation that is just lose, lose, lose on everyone's part," Esch said. "After all this is behind you, I hope you return to the Calvin Gooden who lived 42 years without a problem."

Starving

she hadn't been starved, but either had the capacity to kill her.

Johnson's forensic pathologist told the jury that although Christina was profoundly starved and would likely have died, the sole cause of Christina's death was the head injury and starvation neither caused nor contributed to her death.

Johnson argued to the jury that even if it found that he had been aware that Takak was starving Christina, he had no reason to be aware of a particular danger that Takak might assault Christina.

The jury acquitted Johnson of second-degree murder but found him guilty of manslaughter.

However, the jury also returned a special verdict form showing unanimous agreement that the cause of the child's death was the head injury, not starvation or a combination of injury and starvation

Then Johnson filed a motion seeking acquittal, arguing that even if the state proved he recklessly disregarded the risk that Takak was starving Christina, the jury's special verdict form established that starvation did not contribute to Christina's death, that there was insufficient evidence that he was aware of the risk that Heather Takak would cause the child's head injury and failed to protect Christina. Esch treated the motion as a request for a new trial, vacated the verdict, and ordered a new trial.

The court of appeals reversed the trial court's order granting a new trial and affirmed the manslaughter conviction, saying that Johnson's conviction "stands or falls" on whether a reasonable jury could conclude Takak's physical assault on Christina was foreseeable. The court of appeals said, "without foreseeing the details of the harm, Johnson could foresee Christina's death through her mother's abuse..." that evidence at the trial was sufficient to support manslaughter under this measure of responsibility.

Johnson asked the state Supreme Court to answer the question whether the court of appeals made a mistake in applying this civil negligence definition of whether one could foresee harm to a criminal prosecution based on reck-less conduct

The Supreme Court's opinion said the court of appeal's standard for responsibility was too broad, and cleared the way for a new trial, but ruled out acquittal.

Johnson has served approximately three years in jail since his conviction. According to court officials, prosecutors can charge Johnson on manslaughter, a class-A felony, with a sentence range from a minimum five to seven years to a maximum of 20 years, or charge him on negligent homicide, a class-B felony with a sentence range of zero to 10 years.

Frostbitten but alive

St. Lawrence Island couple survives two days and nights in severe weather

By Tyler Rhodes

Before they heard the approaching snowmachines that would ultimately deliver them to warmth and safety. Cerene Seppilu and Patrick Butler figured that without help, the approaching night could very well be their last.

On Jan. 16 after two nights out in a raging storm in the dead of winter on St. Lawrence Island—and facing a third with no shelter or survival gear-their chances for seeing the next morning seemed grim at best. The couple's clothes were soaked from two nights of lying in the snow and they couldn't feel their frozen feet. Butler's hands were frostbitten where he had been gripping the gun he had been carrying in case of polar bears. Carrying no food or water, they were parched. Seppilu was starting to cramp.

"There's a lot of people who got lost on that island during freezing time, and they didn't make it-especially how long we had been out," Seppilu said from a hospital room in Nome a week after the ordeal. "Two nights. We don't think we could have made it a third night.'

"We were just too wet," Butler added.

Fate, however, had other plans for the couple as a mix of luck, the survivors' determination and the diligence of local search teams saw to it that after nearly two days out in windchills that were estimated to have dipped as cold as -65°F, the longtime couple were plucked from the tundra and brought to safety Jan. 16.

"It felt good, finally. Like it was a dream," Seppilu said of the rescue team's arrival.

Nearly a week after their rescue, bandaged and recovering from the extensive frostbite, Butler and Seppilu were able to reflect on the harrowing events of those two days and nights from their shared hospital room in Nome Jan. 22.

The ordeal started the evening of Jan. 14 when the couple jumped on one snowmachine for a trip from Savoonga to Gambell. Butler and Seppilu said they were traveling to visit friends and family, and to grab a cash register they had left in Gambell to bring back to Savoonga. Seppilu will use the cash register in the ice cream shop she still plans to open in Savoonga once she recovers.

The couple left Savoonga sometime between 7 p.m. and 7:30 p.m. Not too far down the trail they ran into a friend who was on foot after leaving his disabled snowmachine behind. They turned around to give him a ride to a nearby camp outside of Savoonga and left him with their spotlight.

Seppilu and Butler said they turned around and continued down the trail. They were nearing Gambell when the winds kicked up a ground storm, reducing the visibility to nothing in the blowing snow. "We made it to Gambell, almost," Butler said. "We lost the trail markers and started doing circles.

Off the trail and wandering in the whiteout, the couple finally came upon a trail marker. While relieved to be back on a traveled route, it was all the farther the snowmachine could go. It was out of gas.

Rather than try and continue on foot in the dark and the storm, Butler tipped the snowmachine on its side, opened the hood and huddled with Seppilu, trying to stay warm and out of the wind. Throughout the cold night they took turns keeping each other awake. Butler held onto his gun to ward off any polar bears that may have come walking by. Seppilu said she either imagined or heard the creatures rustling about during the night.

By 11:30 p.m. that night, Seppilu's aunt in Gambell, Veronika

James, called the Alaska State Troopers to report the couple overdue from the trip that normally takes three to four hours. Search efforts would start that night and continue for the next

Once daylight broke, Seppilu and Butler began walking. "We just went the way we could see the trail," Butler said. He was worried if they strayed away from the trail markers, they faced the possibility of either wandering out onto the ocean or off into the countryside where no one would be traveling. "I figured if we were going to get found, it was going to be on the trail."

Butler said he figured they were walking back toward Savoonga, but it was in that direction that he could see the trail markers. The couple also realized they were on the summer trail between the two villages, a zigzagging route that is not normally traveled in the winter. Butler said the wind was coming off the sea, persuading them to walk inland to avoid taking the brunt of the storm in the face. "It was windy the whole time, almost," Seppilu said. The winds during the storm were reported be blowing between 30 and 50 mph from the north.

They pushed on toward Savoonga. "We walked until it got dark," Butler said.

With no cover and a thin snow pack, the duo did what they could to get out of the weather that second night. "We couldn't make a cave or nothing," Seppilu said. "We dug a hole as far down as we could." Seppilu said she again thought of polar bears, but that if they were to come at this point, she felt exasperated and brave enough to challenge them if they came.

Group said they are ready to work with him to address the state's pressing issues. Senate President Gary Stevens, R-Kodiak, said the group is sharing the governor's goals, and that priorities are to save and wisely invest state revenues, to create new opportunities for Alaskans to get the education they need, and to keep Alaskan communities safe.

In addition, Stevens said the Senate majority would focus on putting together a package to provide available, affordable and reliable energy for Alaskans' homes and businesses. To that end, Senate Resources Committee co-chairs Bill Wielechowski, D-Anchorage and Lesil McGuire, R-Anchorage, released their recommendations for budget appropriations aimed to help lower energy costs for Alaskans and move communities toward greater energy independence and sustainability.

They recommend $25 million for weatherization programs; $175,000 for a public education campaign to help Alaskans learn how to lower their costs through inexpensive efficiency improvements; $10 million for continued feasibility studies and prepermitting work on Southcentral hydroelectric projects, including Susitna and Chakachamna; $100,000 to provide technical assistance to businesses to help them decrease energy-related expenditures and improve profitability; and $25 million for the Renewable Energy Fund to follow through on the Legislature's commitment to provide $300 million over six years for clean and affordable renewable energy. The second session of the 26th Alaska Legislature began last week and will end, at the latest, on April 18.

Alaska Democrats angry over corporate campaign spending ruling

justices issued a ruling last week that said long-standing bans against corporate political ads created an unconstitutional restraint of free speech. Democratic state legislators last week responded outraged over the 5-4 decision that allows corporations to use their own money to support or oppose candidates for public office. Sen. Bill Wielechowski, D-Anchorage, Reps. Les Gara and Max Gruenberg, both D-Anchorage, and Reps. Scott Kawasaki and David Guttenberg, both of Fairbanks, say the opposite is true, and that the court's decision shifts First Amendment protections from individual Americans to corporations.

Gara, formerly Alaska's assistant attorney general, said that with this decision, corporate America took the First Amendment from Americans. He said that this is why corporate executives put so much money into past presidential campaigns—to successfully take over the Supreme Court. Kawasaki voiced concern that after years of undue influence over policy, now big oil and corporations will have free reign over the election process and be on equal footing with the average Alaskan.

Even President Barack Obama concedes that the Supreme Court decision represents a "major victory for big oil, Wall Street banks, health insurance companies and the other powerful interests that marshal their power every day in Washington to drown out the voices of everyday Americans." The decision may threaten similar state bans on corporate involvement in Alaska elections, and Democrats in the Alaska Legislature are planning to take action.

Tuesday School - just what is it?

By Julie Yoder Elmore

Tuesday School. Folks who see local postings for Tuesday School each week may wonder what in the world Tuesday School is all about.. Basically, Tuesday School is Sunday School and Vacation Bible School all rolled into one on a Tuesday night. This program has been going strong at Community United Methodist Church since October 2008. Tuesday School is open to all children who are in kindergarten through sixth grade.

This year Tuesday School begins with prayer and a meal at 6 p.m. cooked by someone in the Community UMC congregation or parents and grandparents of the students. Around 6:30 p.m. lesson time begins with a Bible Story told by one of the adult leaders or occasionally acted out by some of the students. Following the story students do an activity, usually a craft or sometimes a game that relates to the story they just heard. Tuesday School finishes at 7:30 p.m. with prayer. Although several parents come and pick up their kids, Community UMC also provides rides home for students. On average there are between 20 and 30 students each evening that Tuesday School is in session. Tuesday School is in session during the school year. During the summer, Community UMC hosts Vacation Bible School for one week in July with the help of United Methodist Churches from outside of Alaska.

The name "Tuesday School" was inspired by "Monday School" which is held at Fawn White's church in Oklahoma. Fawn White is a volunteer with the United Methodist Church and moved to Nome at a critical time in the planning process, which was about a month before Tuesday School began. The observation by committee members was that sometimes getting up before 10:00 on a Sunday morning is a challenge, so Community UMC decided to meet the children where they are and have a Christian education opportunity for them on a weeknight when they are up and awake. Many of the children come straight from the Boys & Girls Club and start knocking on the doors at least 20 minutes early, excited for what is in store for them at Tuesday School. The kids are real excited to be part of Tuesday School!

Tuesday School was originally funded through the support of a couple from Minnesota who saw a greater potential for expanded children's ministries in Nome. Additionally, start-up money came in the form of a grant through the New Ministries Committee of the Alaska United Methodist Conference. Tuesday School continues to be funded by United Methodist Churches outside of Nome, as well as Nomeites who have felt called to share their resources with this program. Members of Community UMC support this ministry through the donation of meals, teaching and preparing lessons, donating supplies, and in a variety of other ways. Tuesday School is definitely a community effort.

Community United Methodist Church thanks all in the community of Nome who have supported Tuesday School over the past year and a half. Folks who are interested in helping out in some way or want to register their own child for Tuesday School, please call Pastor Julie Yoder Elmore at 443-2865 for more information.

New Anchorage airport restaurant to feature Norton Sound seafood

By Laurie McNicholas

A new restaurant scheduled to open this summer at Anchorage International Airport (ANC) will feature Norton Sound seafood in menu items created by television chef Al Levinsohn, according to a press release issued last week by HMSHost Corp., which operates several food and beverage concessions at the airport.

The Norton Sound Seafood House restaurant will offer Chef Al's Crab Po Boy, Original Ale battered Halibut Po Boy and Original Ale battered Halibut and King Crab Cake Dinner, among other selections, reports HMSHost. Scheduled to open in August, the restaurant will be located post-security on Concourse C, and will provide a full bar with locally-brewed beer, fine wines and cocktails.

"HMSHost is pleased to work in partnership with the Norton Sound Economic Development Corporation, a local, non-profit corporation, to develop this exciting, locallythemed seafood restaurant for ANC," reads the release.

"NSEDC is very pleased to be a partner in this project for several reasons," Janis Ivanoff, the company's chief executive officer said in the release. "The prime location will certainly result in increased exposure to our region's high-quality seafood; this will let consumers passing through the airport experience the fishery resources that our region has depended on for thousands of years, improve the markets for our local small-boat fishermen, and ultimately to bring the fishermen's and consumers' best interests together in this niche operation in Alaska's busiest airport.

Dan Harrelson, NSEDC's president and board chairman, added these comments in an email to The Nome Nugget: "Having the Norton Sound Seafood House prominently showcase our local products in Alaska's main travel hub will help us demonstrate the high quality of our region's fishery resources to a wide range of consumers. In short, we expect that this will finally give our region's seafood the attention it deserves. We are very appreciative of the partnership with HMSHost and Chef Al, and look forward to working with both on this exciting venture."

Ivanoff and Harrelson emphasized that NSEDC is not investing any funds in the venture in emails to the Nugget. "Rather, we partnered with HMSHost in the development of the bid," Ivanoff wrote. "HMSHost will own/operate the establishment and NSEDC will provide the seafood."

HMSHost said Norton Sound Seafood House is a highlight of the company's 10-year extension of its food and beverage concessions contract with Anchorage International Airport.

"Humpy's Great Alaskan Alehouse, a popular Anchorage pub that features a range of local draft beers and is famous for Alaskan Fish & Chips, is another new concept opening on Concourse B in July," states the press release. "HMSHost's current ANC food and beverage options include Starbucks Coffee, Chili's Too, Quiznos, Legends, Café Del Mundo and Upper One Lounge.

"HMSHost operates in more than 100 airports around the globe, including the 20 busiest airports in North America," the release said. "The company has annual sales in excess of $2.7 billion and employs more than 34,000 sales associates worldwide."

only further soaked their already wet clothing. It took even more effort to stay alert through that second night. "We kept each other alive by waking each other up. I would just try to keep him awake by saying, 'I love you,'" Seppilu said. The thought of whom they would leave behind also drove them to keep going. "Our kids," she said. "We thought about our four kids the whole time."

Together since the 1990s when they were teenagers, Butler and Seppilu said they had to rely on each other to make it through the cold and dark as long as they did. "We've always been close," Seppilu said. "We're best friends."

After holding on until daylight again, the couple started anew on foot. As the day wore on, the weather let up.

While offering respite from the wind, the clearing that afternoon only allowed Seppilu and Butler to realize they were somewhere near halfway between Gambell and Savoonga—too far for them to command their beleaguered bodies to keep going to seek shelter. "That's when we got sad," Butler said. "It was heartbreaking," Seppilu added.

The couple estimates they were within 10 to 15 miles of Gambell when they ran out of gas and had walked somewhere around 20 miles back toward Savoonga.

While Seppilu and Butler were working to stay alive, rescue teams from both Savoonga and Gambell were traveling the northern winter trail to try and locate them. The Troopers were also searching and asking flights in the area to keep an eye out for the missing duo.

It was a team from Savoonga that decided to take a look along the southern trail once the weather broke Jan. 16. It was that team that found the couple around 3 p.m. The team took Butler and Seppilu by snowmachine to Gambell where they were initially treated for frostbite and hypothermia before being flown to Nome and taken to Norton Sound Regional Hospital.

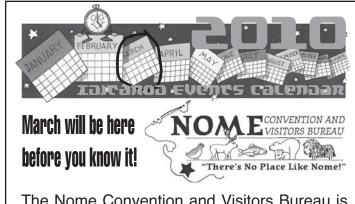

Despite a fair amount of frostbite, Butler was optimistic that they would both largely recover. Both received serious frostbite on their right feet. Butler said he may lose the tip of one of his ring fingers that he had previously nearly lost due to an accident with a saw. Despite saying the recovery from the frostbite has been painful, both Butler and Seppilu were in good spirits a week after their rescue. Both looked forward to being able to return home. Butler said time will tell what further medical attention they may need.

"I'm just glad to have been found," Butler said.

Note: This version addresses and corrects several errors in a cover story in last week's Nome Nugget regarding the rescue. That version incorrectly stated that the duo was rescued on Jan. 22, not Jan. 23, as was the case. That version also incorrectly identified Veronika James as Cerene Seppilu's mother. James is Seppilu's aunt.

Nome boys show mettle against 4A competitors

The Nanook boys basketball team showed they could hang with the big boys this weekend.

On a trip to Anchorage to compete in the Dimond Prep Shootout, Nome joined Grace Christian as the only other class 3A school to wage battle in the eight-team field. The Nanooks worked their way to the championship game before losing to tournament host Dimond High 65-75.

In that championship game Jan. 23, Nome fought its way to within six points late in the fourth quarter after being behind by as much as 20 points. With the Nanooks' tall man, Christian Leckband, sitting injured on the sidelines, the Nanooks had trouble battling Dimond's 6'5" Luke Adams and 6'7" Rylen Hines.

But Nome was able to keep the game within reach largely behind the efforts of Mason Evans and Jeremy Head. Evans logged a game-high eight assists as he ran the team and distributed the ball between his teammates. Head poured in 32 points, nailing 10 of 14 from the field and 12 of 16 from the foul line. Nome's near comeback was helped by a strong second-half, full-court press run by Jon and Mikey Wongittilin along with David Stickel.

Lady Nanooks sweep Hooper Bay at home

With a decisive sweep over Hooper Bay this weekend at home, the Lady Nanooks improved their season record to an even 6-6.

Nome got the weekend going Friday night with a 72-58 romp over the visiting team, led by Richelle Horner who poured in 34 points. A trio of Lady Nanooks, Renee Lammer, Dylan Johnson and Chloe Mattheis, each added 8 points. Several other Nome players got in on the scoring, including Hilary Stiles with 6. Devynn Johnson and Liz Sherman-Luce each scored 3 and Taylor Pomeranz added 2.

The Lady Nanooks came back with more Jan. 23 with a 77-point performance over Hooper Bay's 63. Stiles led the way with 20 as every Nome player put points on the board. Lammer scored 11, Devynn Johnson scored 10, Horner and Choloe Mattheis had 8, Dylann Johnson scored 7, Sherman-Luce scored 6, Charlotte Mattheis scored 4, Pomeranz scored 2 and Kaitlyn Gartung scored 1.

The Lady Nanooks will next take on Seward Jan. 28 at the Bethel Tournament. Seward most recently lost to ACS 44-24 and defeated Grace 43-32. Joining Seward and Nome at the tourney are Unalaska and Bethel.

Helping Haiti: Consider supporting development programs

By Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

The people of Haiti have a Creole proverb, "Piti piti swazo fe nich li," which translates, "Little by little the bird builds its nest." On January 12 at 4:53 p.m., unimaginable numbers of people living in the capital city of Haiti, the poorest country in the western hemisphere, lost their "nests" in a 7.0 earthquake centered just 10 miles west of the city.

Even now, two weeks after the disaster, volunteer and military medical personnel are working around the clock in makeshift operating rooms to save people severely injured by the quake. Disaster experts predict the next medical threat will be from contaminated water sources and outbreaks of communicable diseases like tuberculosis as people are forced to live in crowded conditions.

As with any natural disaster, the initial response to the situation in Haiti has been swift, involving multi-national organizations, governments, and volunteer personnel from all over the world. These charitable entities are skilled at collecting and distributing aid where it is needed most. Several months from now, however, these organizations and volunteers will be gone, and the hard work of rebuilding Haiti's fragile infrastructure will fall back into the hands of people who were already at work in Haiti before the earthquake oc-

One such person is a Haitian named Gueston Pacius. Immediately after the earthquake, Mr. Pacius drove half way across Haiti to search for family in the rubble of Port-au-Prince. He found his family alive, though with injuries. He returned to his home north of Port-au-Prince with his family and 30 other refugees. Since then Mr. Pacius has slept in a truck reserving his small 400 square foot home for his new guests, who sleep in shifts and share what food they have.

Mr. Pacius is in a unique position to help. He is the director of development for the Haiti Christian Development Project (HCDP), a program in Gonaives, Haiti that for years has been teaching Haitian people how to farm, raise animals, render medical care, and sustain businesses through microcredit programs. The program leaders are preparing to temporarily turn the program's training farm into a refugee camp. The camp will be set up first to address urgent medical and nutritional needs of people displaced by the earthquake. The urgent work will then give way to the important work of redevelopment. HCDP plans to provide the refugees with training, education, and micro-loans to support the rebuilding of Haiti by Haitians. Pacius likes to say, "Our vision is to help the people, to help the poor, not to have more, but to be more."

The HCDP program is not alone in its mission. Hundreds of programs already in the country of Haiti are in a position to continue the hard work of development long after disaster relief personnel have departed. organizations take various forms: development farms, schools, orphanages, hospitals, etc. Development programs focus on empowering local people to use local resources to solve local problems and thereby sustain their own communities.

Many fundraising efforts are going on across the United States to provide relief funds for Haitians. People in the Norton Sound region who are looking for ways to help Haiti may consider finding and supporting an organization involved in community development. Trustworthy organizations can be identified through reliable channels like civic organizations, churches, universities, and known national charities.

As when contributing to any worthy cause, those interested in donating to a development program should use due caution in evaluating a program to support. Donors should look for organizations that have a long-term presence in a region with a long-term plan for development. Donors should also ensure the development organization remains accountable to their sponsors regarding how funds are distributed.

Community development experts say their work is about empowering one person at a time to contribute to the good of entire communities. Some will argue that helping one person at a time in the face of such overwhelming need is at best inefficient, but if you ask Gueston Pacius, he would say, "We must remember that little by little the bird builds its nest."

Court puts libido on ice

A White Mountain man will serve two years in jail on charges resulting from a fracas last summer when he entered the home of a White Mountain school employee during the night and demanded sex.

Adrian Barr, 34, on probation with alcohol restrictions, left the house after drinks and a card game, but returned later without invitation and placed the victim in a strangle-hold after she refused him. Then he kicked in the bathroom door where she had fled to protect herself from his advances. When she ran out past him and attempted to telephone for help, according to court records, Barr grabbed the phone, threw it across the room and disabled it. The woman

"Our Prodigal Patriarchs"

Have you ever thought about whom we consider heroes? It is usually those who are persons of great character. If we look at our nation's history, we have numerous heroes: George Washington who could not tell a lie; Abraham Lincoln who was known as "Honest Abe" and perhaps even John F. Kennedy who heroically captained PT 109 during World War II. We seem to look less favorably upon those who are viewed as having flaws in their character: Bill Clinton, Gary Hart and numerous other politicians.

Now, the Book of Jesus tells the story of the patriarchs of the Hebrew nation. There was Abram whom God later renamed Abraham, which means "Father of Nations." Abram left the land of Haran with his wife Sarai, his possessions, and with those he owned, but he was leaving the security of home to go where God had called him. Twice, though, Abram and Sarai pretended that she was his sister rather than his wife because Abram was fearful that others would harm him since they found Sarai beautiful. When God promised Abraham a son, he laughed. He and Sarai took things into their own hands, and Ishmael was born to Hagar, Sarai's maidservant. Abram even sent Ishmael away into the desert once Isaac was born. Abraham was even willing to sacrifice his son Isaac. So it appears, Abram is portrayed as a chicken, a slaveowner, and an adulterer who refuses to pay child support and is even willing to sacrifice his own son.

Isaac also is shown as flawed. He pulls the same trick that his father pulled, pretending that his wife Rebekah is his sister. He also played favorites, favoring his son Esau over Jacob. He also was attempting to cut his son Jacob out of his will when he was conned by Jacob and his mother into blessing Jacob instead of his brother Esau. So Isaac was a bit of a chicken as well, who was easily conned, and favored one child over

And there was Jacob, who received Isaac's whole inheritance. He fled and worked for his Uncle Laban. He favored his wife Rachel over Leah and Rachel's child over the others. He also lay with each of their maidservants so that one wouldn't have more kids than the other. Yet the descendents of his 12 children would become the twelve tribes of Israel. So Jacob is portrayed as a con artist, an adulterer, and one who favors one child over the others.

But the good news is this. God used the patriarchs, flawed persons that they were. God can use us. Whether we are hurting, broken, diseased, or suffering from strained relationships, God can still use us. All that is required is that we recognize our shortcomings, we pause and face God and confess our sins. We may pray using something as simple as the mantra "Lord Jesus Christ, have mercy on me, a sinner." Be prepared. God may have a journey in store for you beyond your wildest

Road to Nome would cost billions

Study favors Yukon route, but don't pack the car just yet

By Diana Haecker

A state-funded transportation study to evaluate the location and benefit of various possible routes to connect western Alaska to the interior road system came out with the recommendation to build a road along the Yukon River to Norton Sound.

It's destination: Nome.

The recommended road route would be 500 miles in length, beginning outside Manley Hot Springs on the Elliot Highway, paralleling the Yukon River, going west from Koyukuk and heading for Koyuk before meeting up with the Nome-Council Highway. The project cost estimates range between $2.3 billion and $2.7 billion.

He added that the road would create jobs during construction, and offer the promise of jobs at resource development projects as well as road crews to maintain the road once built. The authors of the study list as

For its part, the district put on the table an offer that slightly eclipsed that tendered on Jan. 19. The latest offer, which Wehde said was the district's best and final, essentially offered a 1.2 percent raise each year over the next two years. The first offer was essentially for a 1 percent raise each year over the two years.

Despite the increase, the teachers' union said the district's offer showed priests and lay workers of the diocese's rural outposts including Nome and northwestern Alaska.

Last week, U.S. Bankruptcy Court Judge Donald McDonald in Anchorage approved the final details of the consensually formulated plan agreed on by CBNA attorneys and lawyers for the 289 victims of clergy sex abuse. A court-appointed arbitrator will now review case by case to divvy up the $9.8 million that now is in a settlement fund.

Robert Hannon, CBNA's chancellor and special assistant to Bishop Donald Kettler, said that the diocese's 46 parishes chipped in and contributed $650,000 toward the set-

KNOM radio plans to go independent of bishop

Nome's radio station KNOM plans to separate from its current owner, the Catholic Bishop of Northern Alaska.

Station manager Ric Schmidt said that a temporary founding board consisting of him, his wife, Lynette, and Kelly Brabec are in the process of establishing a nonprofit organization named KNOM Radio Mission Inc. Once the paperwork is finished to have the new entity listed as a 501c(3) nonprofit—and once other details are cleared—Schmidt plans to negotiate with CBNA to take over the radio station. "We're looking at purchasing the property and buildings, and we need to get permission from the [Federal Communications Commission] to take over the Bishop's license," Schmidt said.

The $150,000 that was given in KNOM's name toward the diocese's settlement fund has not actually been paid out from the radio station to the fund. "We don't have that kind of money," Schmidt said. Rather, it will be part of the negotiations to buy the radio station and its assets from the

Dear Editor,

"I am a new resident to Nome and I have no children enrolled in our schools. Like many people, I am concerned by the recent decision of the school board regarding contract renewals — but for different reasons than most.

I am concerned that this decision was made behind closed doors, without public discussion, and that the reasoning behind it is being kept from the public. I am reminded of a petulant child, caught misbehaving.

Upon questioning, the child merely mumbles, "I dunno ... " and waits for the person demanding explanations to tire of the one-way conversation and quit asking. The possible explanations that occur to me for this decision are probably much worse than the reality of it, and I can think of numerous outrageous imaginary explanations that place unspeakable blame on everyone involved. When elected representatives begin to believe that it is necessary to obscure their activities from their constituents, it's a

Keep Up The Pressure

Go to the school board meeting next Tuesday. Have three recall petitions at the ready. Will the Nome School Board listen to the recommendations of our superintendent, rescind its action and grant contracts to our high school principal and assistant principal? It is probably true that a stubborn bitter old man and two sweet vindictive baby girls won't change their mind. Want to bet? Anyone who would take such Draconian measures and risk litigation against the school district, the entire board and themselves as individuals isn't likely to think about the consequences.

A reasonable public official would not knowingly take illegal action when being pointedly told at a public forum that they have violated board policy and state law. They have been publically apprised of the consequences of their action. They have given no reasons for their decision but they have stated that they have mysterious secret "compelling" reasons and have not considered job performances. They have by-passed the recommendations of the superintendent and they have not had the courage to tell they public why they made such a hare-brained decision. The consensus of public opinion at the last school board work session was overwhelmingly in support of the high school administration. Folks are not happy. If the city council pulled the plug on the Nome schools it would only hurt the students. If the entire faculty walked away in disgust it would only hurt the students. Can the school board be held responsible for malfeasance in office?

Hopefully the school administration and staff do not throw up their hands in disgust. Who could blame them? But they won't. They are professionals. They have brought much needed discipline and an atmosphere of learning to our schools. They have tackled the bullying problem and restored civility. If the public brings forth a problem to the administration they will try to solve it. If problems are brought to the board they should direct the superintendent to deal with it. This apparently never happened. If no one brings forth a problem, what's the problem? It seems the board has no explanation for the problem. One can only guess. Nomeites will stand up for justice and will not let our schools be held hostage to spite. The board has unleashed a powerful undercurrent of mistrust and hate. Its result is hurtful, irresponsible and ignorant. So, Nomeites, go to the next board meeting Tuesday and be ready to sign the recall petitions. $-{\rm N.L.M.}-$ good bet that they have stopped representing their constituency. The apparent transparency of the behavior of the principals whose contracts are not being renewed, compared to the relative obscurity of the school board in this matter, make it look very much as though the school board is the misbehaving party.

don't have any kids to be affected by this decision, and frankly, I probably would not be interested in the issue, except for the lack of transparency involved. There are, however, other elected officials that work on issues that affect me more directly —and if this behavior is allowed to pass unchallenged, it sends the message to those other officials that they can act similarly, without penalty. I want the school board to understand that if it continues to take the position that it is not accountable to the voting community, then it risks alienating more of that community than just the parents of children within it. Carlton Brown Nome, AK

I applaud the coverage the Nugget has given in the last two issues to the kerfuffle surrounding the actions of the Nome School Board. However, in the latest issue of the newspaper, the article did not mention the main objects of concern: that the NSB violated their own policy, the policy of the Alaska School Board Association (which the NBS adopted), and state law regarding Executive Session.

The School Board is responsible for supervising ONLY the Superintendent! Period. NSB policy and state SB policy - they violated both by reaching down to the level beyond their area of responsibility. Then they violated state law by discussing contract issues (over which they had NO authority) AND did not give the objects of their attention an opportunity to discuss the issues or to defend themselves.

Process. Process! If the NSB had/has issues with the principal and vice principal of Nome-Beltz, they must, according to their own policy, take it up with the Superintendent. Did they do that? NO!

In addition, the three SB members who voted to not continue the contracts in question are LEAVING Nome! What's that about? Is it the old Slash & Burn/ Cut and Run? Thereby leaving this city with the ugly consequences of actions that they will not justify.

I say "Phooey!" Follow the Rules! Justify your votes! If there are "exigent circumstances", always a handy call, which required you to make your decision, tell US what they are and deal with them following your own rules.

I'm pleased that Ms. Timbers voted to revisit the issue at the next Board meeting on Feb. 9. Without her vote, The Three would have been subject to serious civil and legal consequences and a mighty, successful Recall effort.

Process. Process! It applies to everyone, especially to those in elected office. Jana Varrati

Dear Editor,

I hope this finds most all of you doing well. My family and I are OK. My two younger daughters decided that it's their turn to travel, so they joined sports. I'm glad for them. Way to go!

Although our areas probably appreciate GCI for expanding themselves, it isn't much fun having our calls be dropped. Doesn't it take extra minutes too? And, since they bought some of the other phone companies, shouldn't people be able to use those cell phones in these areas?

Worst yet are the calling cards we buy now a days. Oh, its perfectly fine if we want to call out of state, but a lot of our families live here. If we all in-state it takes mega-minutes away. We should get the minutes we paid for, not waste our money buy-That is such a disappointment.

Anyway, I had better quit for now. Take care, you all and I hope you have a great year.

Barrow man gets 100 years

Last weekend, Forrest Ahvakana of Barrow was sentenced to serve 100 years in prison under the "three strikes" law for certain felonies. Ahvakana, 44, was convicted on Nov. 24 of assault in the first and fourth degrees, and burglary in the first degree.

Kotzebue Superior Court Judge Richard Erlich sentenced him to 99 years on the first-degree assault conviction based on serious physical injury to a victim - and to an additional year for domestic violence. On Dec. 8, 2008, Ahvakana repeatedly struck Billy Kaleak with a large, empty whiskey bottle. Kaleak, who was assaulted in his own home, suffered serious blows especially to his head. Ahvakana got the 99-year sentence as he was a repeat offender. In 1987, he was convicted for robbery in the first degree, and in 1990, for sexual assault in the first degree. He received sentences in those cases of five years and 15 years.

State joins legal fight in Chukchi Sea off-shore drilling case

After having successfully gained intervention status in a case brought on by local Native organizations and environmental groups challenging the US Interior Department's decision to allow oil exploration drilling in the Beaufort Sea, the state last Sunday asked the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals for permission to intervene in a similar lawsuit concerning drilling in the Chukchi Sea.

In both cases, the state has sought intervention citing the economic importance of offshore oil and gas production. Although the exploration plans by Shell concern federal lands, the state's new motion for intervention argues that approval or denial of exploration can have an impact on the state treasury and economy. Alaska's attorney general Dan Sullivan said that intervention by the state is important when no other party to the lawsuits can represent all of the state's interests.

Alaska Pipeline files for open season

Last week, the Alaska Pipeline Project filed a plan with the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission to gain approval to conduct an open season to develop Alaska's natural gas resources. The Alaska Pipeline project is partnership between Trans-Canada Corporation and ExxonMobil to develop gas reserves on the Alaska North Slope.

In 2007, the Alaska Legislature passed the Alaska Gasline Inducement Act to help develpers move an Alaska natural gas pipeline project forward to the point of project sanction. In August 2008, the Alaska Legislature approved TransCanada Alaska as the AGIA licensee. Ten months later a second project surfaced when TransCanada and Exxon-Mobil announced their agreement to work together on an Alaska gas pipeline. The information is posted on the Alaska Pipeline Project website and at the FERC website at www.ferc.gov/ and the public can comment until March 1.

The Alaska Pipeline Project cost estimates are that the North Slope to Alberta option will cost between $32 billion and $41 billion. The cost of the Valdez option is expected to be between $20 billion and $26 billion. During the open season, the project developers will reveal the conditions the shippers want in order to ship their gas, where the markets are for the gas and what the cost and size of the pipeline will be.

Legislator pushes to make Juneau governor's duty sta-

Senator Bert Stedman, R-Sitka, last week introduced a bill that aims to clarify state law regarding the governor's duty station and travel allowance. Currently in statute, there are no provisions that require the governor to reside in the capital city and occupy the governor's mansion during his or her term of office. The bill specifies that the governor's duty station is considered to be Juneau.

Senator Stedman's proposed law does not prohibit the governor from maintaining a personal residence in another part of the state, but if he chooses to reside there and not in the governor's mansion, he will no longer be entitled to a travel allowance when away from the capital. The bill comes after ethics complaints had been lodged against former Governor Sarah Palin, who collected state per diem when living in her house in Wasilla instead of the governor's mansion in Juneau. The bill is now on its way to the State Affairs and Judiciary Committees.

Estimates of Pebble Mine deposits grow

AP—The potential riches at Pebble Mine — a huge minerals deposit in southwest Alaska near Bristol Bay and the world's most productive wild salmon streams - keep growing. A new estimate of the gold, copper and molybdenum at Pebble is larger than the 2008 estimate, growing 12 percent for copper, 14 percent for gold and 16 percent for molybdenum, used to strengthen steel.

Northern Dynasty Minerals Ltd., which is developing the prospect with Anglo American PLC, says Pebble contains an estimated 80 billion pounds of copper, over 100 million ounces of gold and 5.6 billion pounds of molybdenum. The mining companies hope to have a preliminary development plan done by the end of the year with permitting to begin in 2011.

Loves to talk about Nome

A woman walks into the Nome Convention and Visitors' Center in downtown Nome.

"Ma'am, you'll have to take a number," Mike Cavin laughs. "See all these people waiting over there?" He waves a plaid shirt clad arm at an empty round table standing in front of a preserved and much admired musk ox.

Ha, ha! The joke is on Cavin, and he knows it. There may have been no visitors at the center Monday morning, but there soon will be as many people parading in for info as Cavin, director, and his staff can handle. He is merrily bracing himself for Iditarod's onslaught of sled dog rooters and tooters next month.

He leans back at his desk and shoots both arms into the air and grins.

"I just found more housing for more visitors," he said. "I am so happy! If there is anything disappointing, it's having people call up and say they aren't coming because they have no place to stay.'

Cavin, on the job since mid-November, works for the Nome Chamber of Commerce. The Chamber has a fiveyear contract with City of Nome to operate the facility and promote tourism. The agreement ends in June 2013.

Cavin said he loves his job. He is paid to talk about Nome and help people from all over who are interested in his favorite topic—Nome.

"I like being interactive with other people, said Cavin, who has many years' experience in hospitality and business services. "I need that diversity and what better place to work than where people want to come in and talk?

"It's a very friendly town. Let's show it off. Let's show 'em what we have," Cavin said. "We are going to continue to live up to the title 'convention center,' but we want to expand the experience beyond convention hours.

their friends, 'I spent a day in Nome. We saw muskox. We panned for gold. I met this guy who ...

He recently had researchers visiting from Norway and people from eastern Russia researching their family tree history on this side of the Bering Strait.

"I'm learning a lot, Cavin said. That's probably the best part of this job. I can travel the world without leaving this office. Someone comes in here, they're not getting out of here without a conversation. I meet so many people from so many places.'

Providing for overflow housing during Iditarod Trail Sled Dog Race, which takes off on the first Saturday in March is just one task on a long list of visitor accommodations. Cavin has other ideas up his sleeve. He wants to set up a center for research to complement the resources at Nome's Carrie M. McLain Museum.

Cavin recognizes the need for Nome to become "bird central" for birdwatchers because the Seward Peninsula is a crossroads in spring for many, many species migrating from Asia, Beringia, Hawaii, lower United States and other sources when nesting time comes around. Cavin wants to set up a way to post dates and locations of local sightings of birds on a NCVC Facebook along with other events to encourage visitors to come to the Nome area to fill out their life list for birds seen.

"A Nome Convention and Visitors Facebook will make it easy for people to see what's here and say to themselves, 'Why don't we book a trip and head up there," he said. "The public will drive the Web site. It is a work in progress, dynamic, changing all the time.

Cavin wants to show the town's respect for sailors who have started navigating the Northwest Passage with Nome as a start or finish in 2007.

cate and have them sign a logbook for their start or finish. That book would be a good thing to keep in the museum as a record of dates, boat information, route, a crew list and the like. I'm always thinking," he said. "I'm a dreamer, but I am also a doer."

Cavin and his staff, Sherri Nayokpuk and Sharon Verdin will keep the Center open every day of the week during the summer tourist traffic.

"This is a multi-tasking job," Cavin said, grinning like he was enjoying the challenge. And indeed, the City of Nome contract frames the Chamber's own goals list:

- · Maintain operations of Front Street office across the street from Nome City Hall.
- · Support and assist local attractions-Folk Fest, Midnight Sun Festival, Iditarod and historical enactments.
- · Present feedback and information to the City Council on a quarterly basis.
- · Re-activate the Nome Visitors Association with local hotel owners, B & B operators, and tourism related businesses and tour providers.
- Recreate, expand and update web-
- Pursue, promote and facilitate tours of Nome for travel writers and journalists.

Not just a logo anymore

Nome Sweet Homes was once just the clever name of a website listing homes for sale. Now it has become an independent real estate office, according to Broker Owner Melissa K. Ford.

'I had a great response from the public with the name of the website," said Ford. "I decided to use that as the office name when I opened my own office because so many people already associated it with home sales."

Ford sold over $2.6 million worth of real estate in 2009. "Most of the property sold later in the year as a result of the First Time Homebuyer Tax Credit original November deadline," said Ford "Now that they've extended it through April of 2010 and expanded that program to include existing home buyers, I anticipate the first half of 2010 to be the most active sales time."

In February 2007 Ford began selling real estate with New Frontier Realty, locally owned and operated by real estate broker- guru Jim Stimpfle. She will continue with the same type of customer outreach, including her website www.nomesweethomes. The website has a wealth of knowledge about the real estate market and detailed information about homes for sale in Nome and the surrounding area.

One of the reasons she decided to branch out on her own was the increasing rate of foreclosures in the area. "REO companies can be very difficult to work with and they require more insurance and education" said Ford. "While a short sale or foreclosure is certainly more challenging, it's very rewarding to find a win-win situation where a buyer gets a great deal and a homeowner is able to walk away without destroying their credit."

The additional education and technology requirements extend to traditional sales as well. One of the goals of Nome Sweet Homes is to bring to the Nome market the benefits of the increasingly advanced technologies that are available for buyers and sellers. From online loan applications to document storage that each client can access regarding their sale or purchase, transactions that utilize technology seem to close quicker. Nome Sweet Homes will provide all the benefits of those resources in addition to the traditional methods.

Prior to becoming a Realtor®, Ford worked as a property manager for Alaska Housing Finance Corporation for 8 years. "The best thing about that was having such a wealth of experience to draw on from the maintenance dept, specifically David McDowell," said Ford. "He really helped to educate me on construction, basic maintenance, boilers and ways to improve energy efficiency."

Ford first came to Nome in 1995 to work at Breaker's, where she still helps out. Coming from a fairly large city in West Virginia, she was at first appalled by the size of the little town, but by the end of one summer she had determined that Nome was to be her next home. "Gotta love this town" Ford grins. "And Breaker's will always have a spot in my heart for bringing me here!"

When she's not selling houses, she likes to snowmobile, fish, camp and enjoy her time at Nome Swimming Pool. She likes talking with homeowners about their renovations and the projects they are working on in their homes. "Sometimes Joe Nome Homeowner has unique solutions to the challenges we face in the arctic" says Ford.

And of course, she would love to discuss buying or selling a Nome Sweet Home!

Up to $124 million at stake in CDQs' bid for tax protection

Congressional committee estimates revenue cost of proposed legislation to shelter business activities

By Laurie McNicholas

Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. and the five other companies in the Western Alaska Community Development Quota Program are seeking an amendment to the federal tax code to make income from all of their business activities tax exempt.

If their legislative proposals become law, the government will forego from $92 million to $124 million in tax receipts in the next 10 years, according to a report issued last October by Thomas Barthold, chief of staff for the Joint Committee on Taxation. (See the letter from Barthold to Sens. Lisa Murkowski and Mark Begich on the next page.) The Joint Committee on Taxation prepares official revenue estimates of all tax legislation considered by the Congress.

All six CDQ companies are organized as non-profit Alaska corporations and have tax-exempt status with the Internal Revenue Service. However, an ongoing debate among executives of the companies and their financial and legal advisors centers on whether some business activities of the companies are beyond the scope of their tax-exempt status. Under federal law, trade or business activities not substantially related to the purposes for which an entity is granted tax-exempt status are subject to taxation.

To resolve the issue, last year the CDQ groups asked the Alaska Congressional delegation to sponsor legislation to specify the scope of their tax-exempt activities in an amendment to the Internal Revenue Code. On April 28 Sens. Murkowski and Begich submitted the initial tax code amendment proposal to the Joint Committee on Taxation on behalf of all six CDQs. The proposed legislation provides that business activities conducted by CDQ entities, including harvesting, processing, transportation, sales and marketing of fish or fish products are substantially related to the purposes on which their tax-exempt status is based.

NSEDC supports the initial proposal but did not participate with the other CDQ companies in its development. The proposal submitted to the Joint Committee on Taxation April 28 does not refer to wholly owned subsidiaries or to refunds of taxes paid on unrelated business income by subsidiaries of CDQ entities (issues important to NSEDC), so the company developed supplemental language to include such provisions. Sens. Murkowski and Begich submitted the supplemental language to the Joint Committee on Taxation on Oct. 15.

How tax issues evolved

The CDQ program was started in 1992 by the North Pacific Fishery Management Council to build sustainable fisheries-based economies in 65 communities within a 50-mile radius of the Bering Sea. The program later was included in the Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act.

Management Act.

The council allocated 7.5 percent of the annual Bering Sea pollock harvest quota to the program for harvest by the CDQ groups or fishing partners authorized by the companies in exchange for royalties. CDQ harvest royalties are not taxable. Later the annual CDQ pollock harvest quota was increased to 10 percent and the program received annual harvest quota allocations in other Bering Sea and Aleutian Islands fisheries.

Pollock royalties initially generated the majority of CDQ program revenues. Eventually the CDQ entities made substantial equity investments in fishing and processing operations in the Bering Sea/Aleutian Islands area. For example, in 1998 NSEDC bought a 50 percent ownership interest in Glacier Fish Co., which owned two factory trawlers and had harvested NSEDC's CDQ pollock since the program began.

In the early years of the program, only one of the six companies envisioned that some of its investment would be taxable. In 1992 the Aleutian Pribilof Island Community Development Association (APICDA) was granted tax-exempt status under Section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code covering organizations operated exclusively for charitable and educational purposes, among others. APICDA formed two wholly owned for-profit subsidiaries in 1994.

"We structured ourselves in anticipation that income from our [for-profit] investments would be subject to unrelated business income tax," APICDA's Chief Executive Officer Larry Cotter said in a recent phone interview with The Nome Nugget. Currently the company has a dozen subsidiaries, all of which conduct activities that are subject to taxation, according to APICDA's 2008 annual report.

NSEDC, which represents 15 Bering Strait communities in the CDQ program, is among five CDQ companies that were granted tax-exempt status under section 501(c)(4) of the code as social welfare organizations in 1992. The other four are the Bristol Bay Economic Development Corp., the Central Bering Sea Fishermen's Association, the Coastal Villages Region Fund and the Yukon Delta Fisheries Development Association.

These five companies did not pay unrelated business income tax on revenue from their Bering Sea equity investments that were directly owned by the parent nonprofit entity until 2007, according to a memorandum submitted with the proposed tax code amendment to the Joint Committee on Taxation by Sens. Murkowski and Begich on April 28.

"The consistent position taken by these groups until this time was that their income from the Bering Sea investments was substantially related to their exempt purpose and, therefore non-taxable," states the memorandum, which is addressed to legislative staff and dated March 31, 2009. The source of the memorandum is not identified.

In 2007 NSEDC consulted with legal advisors in Washington, D.C., and determined that income from some of its investments is taxable as unrelated business income. The company reportedly has paid $8.1 million in back taxes, interest and penalties for the years 2005 through 2007, and about $3 million for 2008 to the IRS. NSEDC also has paid state taxes for those periods. The company's tax liability for 2009 has not yet been made public. In 2008 NSEDC established a wholly owned for-profit subsidiary, Siu Alaska Corp., to hold taxable assets such as its investment

APICDA's Cotter praised NSEDC for its action. "I, frankly, was proud of them," he said.

Committee reports findings

On Oct. 21 Sens. Murkowski and Begich received a letter from Barthold describing the effects of the proposed legislation. He said it would exclude the revenues derived by CDQ companies from activities such as harvesting, processing, transportation, sales and marketing of fish or fish products from taxation as unrelated business income. His letter includes a table showing revenue estimates the government would forego in a 10-year period for the proposal with supplemental language ($124 million) and for the proposal without supplemental language ($92 million).

"We believe that some of the activities covered by your proposal could be found to be taxable under present law," Barthold wrote. "Therefore, your proposal results in less tax revenue in subsequent years. Furthermore, it is possible that the entities might expand their newly tax-exempt activities beyond current levels. To the extent that these entities compete with taxable entities, reducing taxable entities' profits, your proposal would indirectly reduce revenue from these taxable entities.

"Including the supplemental language, taxable subsidiaries wholly owned by CDQ entities could seek refunds and would pay less tax in subsequent years, until their assets are transferred back to the CDQ entities." Barthold continued. "Moreover, the supplemental language regarding the effective date results in a combination of refunds for previously paid tax and less collection of unpaid tax from previous years.

"For the purpose of this estimate, we assume that your proposal and supplemental language are effective on the date of enactment, except that with the supplemental language your proposal would apply retroactively as described above," Barthold noted. "We assume the date of enactment to be December 1, 2009." (The proposed legislation has not yet been introduced in Congress, according to CDQ entities and Congressional sources.)

CDQ executives comment

The Nome Nugget recently asked executives of three CDQ companies for their reactions to Barthold's letter. "I think we are going to continue to push for federal legislation to rectify the situation we are in right now," said Robin Samuelson, chief executive officer of the Bristol Bay Economic Development Corp. "Because we give scholarships and training, we should not be taxed," he added. "I think we fit the bill for a non-taxable group...." Samuelson said all six CDQ entities have met with members of the Alaska Congressional delegation and are working with them.

"I think it's a very heavy lift for our delegation to get this legislation through," commented APICDA's Cotter. Asked if he supports the proposals, he replied: "At this point in time, sure. At some point this issue needs to be resolved. We're gonna be a team player."

Cotter does not expect his company to benefit significantly from the supplemental language in the proposal, however. "We've only had to pay a minimal amount [of taxes] over the years," he said, explaining that APICDA has used net operating losses from some investments to defray profits from other investments. "None of our community investments ever make much money," he added. "Their losses are offset by revenues generated in non-community investments. Outof-community investments generate large returns.

Cotter said if the supplemental language in the proposal is enacted, APICDA might get a tax refund of less than six figures, NSEDC would be reimbursed for tax payments and the other four CDQ companies would not have to pay back taxes.

Dan Harrelson, NSEDC's president and board chairman, explained his company's reasons for submitting supplemental language for the proposed tax code amendment in an e-mail to the Nugget. "NSEDC has sought additional clarification in the legislative proposal that would bring certainty to the tax treatment of the CDQ groups for all periods, including past years, and that would put all the groups on an equal footing with respect to taxes if the principal CDQ tax amendment (developed by other groups) is enacted," Harrelson wrote. "We feel that this additional clarification would benefit all of the groups.'

Harrelson also wrote: "...NSEDC supports the amendment and agrees that an amendment would be helpful to the CDQ sector as a whole, and Senators Murkowski and Begich and Congressman [Don] Young have told the CDQ groups that they believe the CDQ tax amendment is meritorious; however, it is our understanding that, due in part to the Congressional focus on the health care reform, no action is expected in the near future.

"If during the second session of the 111th Congress, the Alaska Delegation requests any additional support for the legislation we will certainly do our best to help move the tax package forward; there is no doubt that this additional income would be of great importance to the corporation and the projects and programs we're able to administer. However, we would hope that your readers would be assured that NSEDC has taken a very proactive approach to protecting the corporation and its assets with respect to taxation and understand that we are completely confident that no matter the outcome of legislation that we're well-positioned for continued success in carrying out the important mission of the organization...."

CDQ program benefits

Samuelson chairs a six-member administrative panel composed of one representative from each CDO entity-the Western Alaska Community Development Association. WACDA's 2008 CDQ program report provides the following summary of program benefits.

"At the program's inception in 1992, the 65 eligible villages faced discouraging circumstances, limited economic opportunities, underemployment, heavy reliance on subsistence activities, poverty rates far above state and national averages, and a daunting cost of living. Over the course of the past 16 years, the program has generated more than $240 million in wages, payments to fishers, scholarships and training benefits. Additional benefits from the program accrue to local borough and state governments. In 2008, payments to individuals and communities totaled more than $51 million."

In 2008 the six CDQ companies generated nearly $190 million in revenue and had combined assets of $427.6 million, according to the WACDA report.

Report sees some CDQ companies' activities as taxable

Editor's note: Following is the content of a letter from Thomas A. Barthold, chief of staff of the Joint Committee on Taxation, to Sens. Lisa Murkowski and Mark Begich in response to their request for a revenue cost estimate of proposed legislation to exempt certain business activities of the six Alaska Community Development Quota Program entities from federal taxation. The Nome Nugget obtained a copy of the letter, datestamped Oct. 15, 2009, from Sen. Murkowski's office.

The Joint Committee on Taxation is a nonpartisan Congressional committee originally established under the Revenue Act of 1926. It is composed of five members of the Senate Committee on Finance and five members from the House Committee on Ways and Means. The committee staff is closely involved in the tax legislative process, including preparing official revenue estimates of all tax legislation considered by the Congress.

The supplemental language Barthold describes below was added to the proposed legislation by Norton Sound Economic Development Corp., which represents 15 Bering Strait communities in the CDQ program.

"Dear Senator Murkowski and Senator Begich:

"This letter is in response to your request of April 28, 2009, for a revenue estimate of a proposal to specify the scope of tax-exempt activities of six Alaska Community Development Quota ('CDQ') program entities identified in section 305(i)(1)(D) of the Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act, as in effect on the date of enactment of your proposal. Your proposal provides that certain business activities of the six entities undertaken in connection with their fisheries activities in Alaska are substantially related to the exercise or performance of the purposes constituting the basis of each entity's exemption from U.S tax under section 501(a) of the Internal Revenue Code (the 'Code')

'On October 15, you provided us with supplemental language specifying that these activities are also exempt from taxation when conducted by a taxable subsidiary that is wholly owned by a CDQ entity, provided that the activities would have been treated as related to the parent CDQ entity if conducted directly by the CDQ entity. The supplemental language also provides that, within 18 months after enactment, assets producing tax-exempt income may be transferred from such a subsidiary to the parent CDQ entity without taxable gain or income to either party. Furthermore, with the supplemental language, your proposal would apply with respect to a taxpayer for any taxable years for which a claim for credit or refund is not barred under section 6511 of the Code. You requested that we provide estimates both with and without this new language.

"We believe that some of the activities covered by your proposal could be found to be taxable under present law. Therefore, your proposal results in less tax revenue in subsequent years. Furthermore, it is possible that the entities might expand their newly tax-exempt activities bevond current levels. To the extent that these entities compete with taxable entities, reducing taxable entities' profits, your proposal would indirectly reduce revenue from these

Arctic Trace Submersible Heat Trace Freeze Protection System

Water Supply

Temperature Limiting heating cable incorporates a special Nonflammable metal heating element that decreases its heat output in response to temperature changes giving the cable a temperature limiting quality thus saving energy, protecting pipes from damage due to overheating, and delivering the watt output required by the process condition. Arctic Trace is also suitable for use inside the pipe or tank allowing efficient energy transfer and at the same time protecting personnel and equipment. The heater is equipped with large 12 AWG copper bus wires making it possible to run the heater in long runs up to 1000' consequently reducing the installation cost associated with multiple power connections.

Electric Heat Tracing Application

Arctic Trace ® Heating cable includes heaters designed for many pipe freezing applications. The versatility allows the heater to be installed inside or outside the pipe making the cable suitable for the freeze protection of:

Arctic Trace ® First developed in 1982 by du Alaska Company Incorporated Engineers, who had the idea of putting a temperature resistance wire inside a water service pipe located in the city of Anchorage, Alaska. They reasoned if it were possible to put the heater in direct contact with the process, a great savings could be achieved with efficient heat transfer, cost reduction in installation, and increase the safety of personnel and equipment reducing the risk of fire or shock. Since then thousands of installations have been done and are still in use today

The Power of Reading

By Joy Hewitt

Books are not weapons. Usually. That said, the third through sixth grades district-level Battle of Books took place last Tuesday in the Nome Elementary Commons. Over 80 students participated, including 13 kids from Anvil City Science Academy.

In the first battle, nine teams went head to head with each other, answering 16 questions from a list of 14 titles. In what culminated from several months of reading and practice, students sat in teams on the stage, and earned 5 points for every correct title, 3 points for the correct author, for a potential 128 points during the district-level battle. Four teams tied with 104 points, necessitating a tiebreaker. In the end, third graders: Brayden Bahnke, Devan Otton, Dawson Evans, Sam Bourdon and Skylar Buffas took the title, just 8 points ahead of Jillian Iyatunguk, Amber Gray, Amy Bioff, Sidney Kineen and Kastyn Lie. Such a strong finish reflects a great effort from students, parents and teachers.

In the second battle, three Anvil City Science Academy teams battled against four teams from Nome Elementary School (NES) at the fifth and sixth grade level. Finishing in first place were Nome Elementary's Connor Merrill, Zach Tuell, Joshua Cannon and Hannah Alowa. Second place finishers from Anvil City Science Academy were Cjache Kang, Kevynn Cox, Sarah Mostoller and Tori Thomas.

Using an all-star team from the district battles, Nome Public Schools is competing in the state-level Battle of Books competition during the third week in February. Representing NES from the third/fourth grade are Amber Gray, Brayden Bahnke, Sidney Kineen, Judith Jessup and Annalise Contreras. Fifth/sixth grade representatives are Hannah Alowa, Wilson Hoogendorn, William Herzner and Joshua Cannon. From Nome-Beltz High School, seventh/eighth graders Oliver Hoogendorn, Rosa Schmidt, Jennelle Trowbridge and Bruce Landry will represent the junior high, and Cecilia Wehde, Nick Morgan, Joel Jorgensen and Jeffrey Rose will represent the senior high.

The Battle of Books for first grade will take place on Monday, February 8 at 1:00 in the Nome Elementary School Library. Kindergarten and second grade battles will take place on Tuesday, February 9 at 12:30 and 1:15 respectively.

Golovin Gals cast their spell Molly Moses heads to state bee

By Jeff Erickson

The creator of the Winnie the Pooh books, A.A. Milne once said, "My spelling is wobbly. It's good spelling, but it wobbles and the letters get in the wrong places."

None of the 40 third- to eighthgrade students from the Bering Strait School District were afforded the luxury this famed author had. No "wobbles" were allowed as each stepped to the podium to grasp the microphone at the 15th annual Bering Strait School District Spelling Bee in Brevig Mission Jan. 26. Each had spent many, many hours studying the pages of potential words over the past months and had earned their place in the spotlight by finishing in the top three at their respective schools. All were prepared to give their best.

As each took their turn in spelling the given word it soon became apparent that this year's field was one of the best prepared veteran coaches and observers could remember. The attrition rate was low and, although a few fell by the wayside with each successive round, the field remained substantially longer than any in recent memory. The word list gets increasingly difficult. Finally the field was trimmed to five, then four before only three spellers remained. Remarkably the final three were the entire Golovin team, something that had never been done. All three girls were very well prepared, and the final order of finish wasn't determined until several extra rounds. When the smoke cleared Molly Moses was crowned "BSSD Spelling Bee Champion" followed by Chelsea Fagerstrom and Tatiana Chanar. Molly will represent the district at the state bee Feb. 26 in Anchorage.

no real movement. "The Nome Education Association views the 0.2 percent increase offered by the school board as essentially no movement and an indication that they were unwilling to make any real effort to keep Nome competitive with the rest of the state," the association's bargaining team said in a written statement.

Despite currently working in the first year of a three-year contract, the teachers and district were only able to settle on pay for the contract's first year. That agreement gave teachers a 1.5 percent raise for the current school year only after months of negotiations that ultimately required a federal mediator. That agreement left salaries for the next two years still to be settled.

To help break the stalemate, a federal mediator will now assist in the process as the two sides work to come to some sort of consensus. "Mediation at its finest is an opportunity to continue the process using the same process we started with," Wehde said.

Mediation, however, is not guaranteed to produce a resolution. If the two sides remain at an impasse, Wehde said the process would move to nonbinding arbitration.

The financial gulf between what each side is seeking is pretty wide. Depending on how the 7 percent would be spread out over the two years—the teachers' association did not specify a preference—the district calculates it would cost anywhere between $292,000 to $558,000 to satisfy the education association's two-year request. The district figured it would cost approximately $160,000 to implement its last, best offer.

Wehde said the district cannot afford to honor the association's request without making it felt somewhere else in its operations. "Nome Public Schools cannot meet a 7 percent raise request by our teacher group without a drastic reduction of personnel, programs and services," Wehde wrote. "This would not be in the best interests of our employees, students and the community."

The education association argues that an uncompetitive salary scale in comparison with the rest of the state will also hurt the district. "Competitive wage structure gives more flexibility to the school boards in that they can establish higher standards when deciding to retain a teacher. Non-competitive wages force the school board's hands to keep and retain teachers who may not otherwise make the grade, simply because finding a replacement would be very difficult," the education association negotiating team wrote. "In turn, not being competitive hurts the education of our students due to the smaller pool of applicants for future hiring committees when they are presented the task of finding high-quality teachers when openings arise."

In addition to the percentage of increase, the competitive nature of the salaries is a point of difference between the two bargaining teams. While the teachers association points to discrepancies in the percentage of increase and starting salaries in comparison to other districts, Nome Public Schools' team argues that its teachers' salaries are more competitive than they may appear.

"Compared to the other school districts in Alaska, the Nome teacher pay schedule is robust and actively competitive. We are in the top 1/3 of reported school district teacher pay in Alaska," Wehde wrote in a press release voicing the district's position. "Good pay attracts good teachers, and I only need to point with pride to the low turnover last year and the excellent teachers in our district."

The numbers do support Wehde's assertion on low turnover. When it comes to base, or starting pay, Nome lags a little behind the top third of 44 school districts reported on by the Alaska Association of School Boards, ranking 18th at $41,621. But it does crack the top third in terms of average pay at $60,258, indicating teachers remain with the district longer and earn higher salaries. Districts with higher turnover will have a lower average salary with teachers cycling through and leaving before they reach the higher pay grades.

As an example, the Bering Strait School District, which encompasses 16 sites in the region, outpaces Nome in pay for both entry-level and more experienced teachers. But when compared by what an average teacher makes in each district, Nome ranks 16th in the list of 44 districts while BSSD ranks 35th.

Nome also ranks high when it comes to top teacher salary at $77,708. On the list of 44 districts it ranks 12th for the salary ceiling, just two spots behind the Bering Strait schools which offer $77,837 at the top.

To set the salaries offered by Nome Public Schools side by side with neighboring districts is not exactly an apples-to-apples comparison. Serving just one community, Nome schools are supported by the municipal tax base in addition to its state funding. Neighboring districts, which cover anywhere from 11 to 16 villages, are supported by a more widespread tax base through what are known as Regional Educational Attendance Areas.

The districts also differ in how much money they receive from the state. A funding formula based on a region's cost of living allocates different dollar amounts per student to different districts. For fiscal year 2011, Nome will receive $9,672 per student while the Northwest Arctic Borough School District will receive $11,955 and the Bering Strait School District will get $12,814 per student.

The education association's arguments, however, reflect more on how the district handles raises. Saying the district's offer keeps salaries near stagnant, while other districts across the state are seeing average increases well above what Nome teachers have been offered. "According a to document supplied by the Association of Alaska School Boards, the Nome Education Association's offer was still below reported districts' settlements," the education association's statement reads. "This idea that the offer made by the Nome School Board was well below the average settlements around the state was echoed by Mark Jones, a representative of National Education Association Alaska, who has stated to the Nome Educational Association that the general trend around the state of Alaska for threeyear contracts the last several years has been 3 percent [per year for the three years covered by contracts]."

Lady Nanooks win Bethel tournament

Although they may have been on the road, the Lady Nanooks pretty much owned the gym in Bethel last weekend.

Scoring three strong victories, the girls were named champions of the 2009 Bethel Basketball Classic. Like their male counterparts, the girls defeated Seward, Unalaska and tournament hosts Bethel en route to the title. It is the first time the Lady Nanooks have taken the tournament.

Hilary Stiles, who also won the hotshot competition, and Richelle Horner were both named to the alltournament team for their play.

Nome came out of the gate swinging Jan. 28 against Seward and took a 35-20 lead into the second half of play. The Seahawks came back in the third, scoring 17 to Nome's 5 in the third to tighten things up. Stiles, who led the game with 16, put up 7 points in the fourth quarter, including a late three-pointer that sealed the deal for Nome. The Lady Nanooks won the game 51-43. In addition to Stiles, Liz Sherman-Luce also showed a double-digit effort, adding 10 points.

After Thursday's win, Nome never looked back as they took down Unalaska 44-27 and Bethel 43-21 to win the tourney. In Friday's win against Unalaska, Horner poured in 20 points, backed up by Luce's 9. In Saturday's win, Stiles led Nome with 13, followed by Devynn Johnson who scored 10. Horner scored 9.

The three wins last weekend improved the girls' season record to 9-6. The girls and boys will travel together again this weekend, this time heading North for the Barrow tournament Feb. 4-6. In Barrow, Nome will again face Unalaska, Skyview and tourney hosts Barrow.

Nome boys: Another tourney, another trophy

The steamroller that is the Nome boys basketball team shows no sign of stopping this season.

A weekend trip to Bethel netted the boys yet another trophy for their collection this year as they went threefor-three against Seward, Unalaska and tournament hosts Bethel. On their way to the title, Nome's Jeremy Head was named tournament MVP while Tim Sullivan and Mason Evans were named to the all-tourney team. Sullivan also won the hotshot competition.

In Thursday's win against Seward, Head set a new high mark for the most points scored in a game during the tournament. Putting up 35 points on the board, Head led Nome to the 77-52 win against the Seahawks. Those 35 points beat the former record by 1, which was held by Head's former teammate, Jesse Blandford, and Teddy Street.

Nome was able to break a 31-31 stalemate at halftime with a 46-point second half. In addition to Head's 35 points, Sullivan put up 17 and Jon Wongittilin scored 15.

The Nanooks came out hot again on Friday with a 82-53 win over Unalaska. Head again led the way for Nome with 28 points. Sullivan lit up the floor in the first half, draining five 3-pointers on the way to 23 points for the game. Mason Evans scored 11.

The Nanooks sputtered a bit at the start of Saturday's game against Bethel. Scoring just 13 points in the first half, Nome picked it up in the second to outscore Bethel 37-27 in the second. Head again led the team with 20 points, followed by David Stickel and Sullivan, who each had 9.

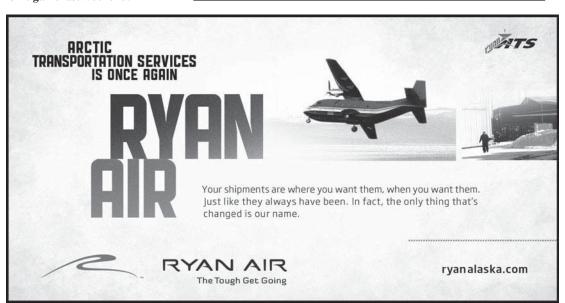

Nome improved to 13-2 with the wins for the season. The boys will head to Barrow this weekend for a tournament at which they will play Unalaska, Skyview and Barrow. The Nanooks will be looking for a little revenge against the tournament hosts as Barrow was one of the two teams this year to deal Nome a loss. In that meeting at the season's start, the Whalers beat Nome 66-57.

Iron Dog:

Nome racers ready for a slightly different race

By Tyler Rhodes

The view of this year's Iron Dog snowmachine race from Nome come mid-February should look no different than it has in the recent past.

Pairs of racers will still come blazing into town off the sea ice. The Public Works Building will again be filled wall-to-wall with machines ready for a wrenching. And the ramp behind Subway will again serve as the launching point for the racers to head out for Fairbanks.

It's how the racers get to Nome that will be different.

This year's Iron Dog will operate more as a staged race than in previous years. In previous years there were six points at which racers could take their three required layover stops before arriving in Nome. This year those stops will be cut to three, essentially turning each day of the event into a race of its own.

The yearly Iron Dog is billed as the world's longest snowmachine race, taking competitors from Big Lake to Nome before retracing their route and turning to Fairbanks for the finish. The route covers nearly 2,000 miles of open country, forests, mountain passes, frozen rivers and the Bering Sea coast. This year's pro class race starts Feb. 21.

Racers will now be required to take a 12-hour layover in McGrath, an eight-hour layover in Galena and an eight-hour layover in Unalakleet before heading to the race's midway point in Nome. Racers will again have to stop in Unalakleet and Galena before the final hold in Tanana to ensure a mid-day finish in Fairbanks.

Iron Dog Development Director Heidi Griffin said the organization introduced the new rules as the race grows and brings in new racers and sponsors. "It makes the race easier to follow," she said. "It's not a total staged race; it's just on its way to being so. So we'll just test out some new rules and see how it goes."

Griffin said the new rules have produced a variety of reactions from participants. "It's a mixed bag. Some [racers] like it because it really changes strategies. It forces them to get from one place to the next," she said. Griffin added that other long-time racers have voiced their disapproval for the same reason—it changes, or even eliminates, strategy, some say.

Iron Dog veteran and Nome resident John Bahnke III said he wasn't upset over the new rules, but he did note that it will change the nature of the race. "Making it a stage race makes it a day race everyday for a week," he said. "It took a lot of the strategy out of it."

Bahnke said the change will likely push racers to ride harder, dealing more punishment to their machines. "It's going to make it a sprint race every day," he said, noting those with planes and parts following them on the trail will have an advantage.

Bahnke likened the previous rule set to those of the Iditarod which gives teams more autonomy on where they can declare layovers. "You could do your layovers more or less where you felt comfortable doing them. Basically you were running your own race. That's what I liked about it before," he said.

Despite preferring the old rules, Bahnke said he didn't see the new structure as a game-changer for himself or others who have a few races under their belt. "I don't know if there's an advantage or disadvantage for the guys who raced it for a few years," he said. Bahnke is teaming

By Pastor Julie Yoder Elmore Community United Methodist Church on behalf of the Nome Ministerial Association Scripture Reference Genesis 37-50

Joseph is one of the most righteous characters in the Old Testament. From the time he was young he found favor with his father and always honored his father's wishes. Jacob made it clear that Joseph was his favorite son when he made him a coat of many colors and did not do the same for his other sons. Joseph's older brothers already did not like him because he tattled on them. The coat of many colors certainly did not help Joseph win any popularity contests with his brothers.

One day, Jacob asked Joseph to go and check on his brothers who were tending their sheep in the countryside. Being an obedient son, he went and found them. As they saw him approaching they decided to get rid of him. They ended up selling him into slavery and told Jacob that a wild animal had killed Joseph. Eventually Joseph became the slave of Potiphar, one of the Pharaoh's top officials. Potiphar found Joseph to be very competent and trustworthy. Over time, Potiphar's wife became infatuated with Joseph and wanted to sleep with him. Joseph, being trustworthy, kept refusing her advances. One day she made sure that Joseph and she were alone in the house and grabbed him by the garment and demanded that he sleep with her. He wiggled out of his garment and ran from the house. With his garment in her hand, she told Potiphar that Joseph tried to attack her and Potiphar believed her. Joseph was then thrown in jail.

While in jail Joseph found favor with the head prison guard and also interpreted dreams with the help of God. He even had an opportunity to interpret Pharaoh's dream that predicted seven years of plenty followed by seven years of famine in the land of Egypt. Eventually, Joseph became the governor and in charge of food distribution during the years of famine. Among the food seekers were Joseph's brothers. While he does not reveal himself at first and gives them a hard time, eventually the family is reunited and is spared from dying of starvation.

Even though bad things kept happening to Joseph, God was present with Joseph helping him make the best out of these gloomy situations. Things happen to us that at first seem hopeless. Though there was much destruction in Haiti several weeks ago, God is present with the people there as they recover, grieve, and relearn their life after this traumatic event. Though we strive to do what is right, things will not always go our way. With God on our side, we can take the most hopeless of situations and make the best of them. Ultimately God is in control and will take care of us. We just need to put our faith in God and know that in the words of Julian of Norwich, "All will be well and all will be well in all manner of things will be well."

READY TO ROLL—Nome's Tre West III and Peter Reigch get a thumbs up before leaving Nome for the second half of the 2009 Iron Dog.

Iron Dog

up again with Brad Reich from Kiana for this year's race.

Other racers with Nome roots more or less shrugged off the changes. "I'm pretty sure since everyone's in the same boat, it shouldn't affect our strategy too much," said Tre West III, who is racing with Wasilla's Andy George this year.

Mike Morgan, who is teamed with fellow Nome-grown racer Joe Fullwood this year, said the rule change will reflect what the top racers have already been doing. "I think it's going to be a good race regardless of what the layovers are. All the fast teams are still going to be here, here, and here," Morgan said, referring to the stops in McGrath, Galena and Unalakleet. "It's not going to change a whole lot as far as we're concerned; if you're on top of it you're going to be flying, regardless."

Morgan made no bones about his desire to be among those first teams to be flying into the checkpoints. While only racing in his second Iron Dog, Morgan is coming off an impressive rookie finish in fifth place last year. "We definitely want to win it. We're shooting for the top three," Morgan said. Teamed up with Tyler Huntington last year, Morgan said they ran out of gas toward the end of the race, which caused them to lose valuable time and fourth place.

Fullwood will be jumping into his first Iron Dog, but has extensive race experience. Morgan said he and Full-wood have been riding a fair amount outside of Anchorage to train and work the kinks out of their new Polaris Rush machines.

Bahnke's training routine has been a little more low-key in Nome where snow does not abound this season. "Snow conditions are terrible. It's gotten to the point where it's hard to justify going on a ride when it's just going to tear up your machine," he said.

While Bahnke jokes about preparing by watching race movies like "Talladega Nights," when the flag drops Feb. 21 he and Reich will be in the hunt for a top finish. The duo last raced together in 2008 when they took sixth. Bahnke said the finish came after some initial troubles that cost them approximately six hours.

Like everyone else, Bahnke is angling to win. However, he said he would be pleased with a top-five finish. "Even the top three is pretty cool," he said. To get there, Bahnke again fell back on the idea of focusing on his strategy. "We've got the same game plan—run our own race, try not to get caught up with what everybody else is doing. If we're not feeling comfortable, we're not going to push it," he said.

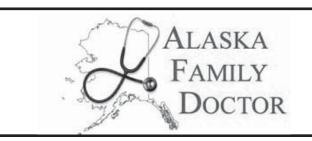

Past racers who have found themselves in the lead but rode their machines or bodies too hard have quickly found themselves out of the running due to busted equipment or bones.

Also from Nome and back for another round in the Iron Dog are Harvey and Howard Farley. The 39-year-olds will be pointing their Ski-Doo Renegade E-Tec 600s toward home from Big Lake and then on to Fairbanks for another attempt at Iron Dog glory.

Nome's West isn't parsing his words when it comes to his hopes. "The goal is first place," he said. It's a place George, his partner, has been before, winning the race in 2006. West said the reports of bare trail on either side of the Alaska range doesn't have him too stressed. "It's good for us. The rougher the better," he said

Rough it could be. There are reports of meager snow packs all along the coast, along the Yukon and in Fairbanks. "I have heard talk about the Yukon being anything from a mixture of glare ice to sand," Bahnke said. "But we have a couple weeks left. It might snow."

SHINGLES: Can a Vaccine Help? By Bob Lawrence, MD

Shingles is a painful rash primarily striking adults. It is caused by the same virus that causes chicken pox in children. A few years ago, the FDA approved a vaccine for the prevention of shingles in older adults. Many people have asked if this "shingles" vaccine is right for them, and if so, at what age they should receive the immunization. Only you and your medical provider can answer these questions, but a little background information may help guide the discussion.

Shingles is caused by the varicella zoster virus (VZV). Prior to 1995, when a vaccine against VZV became available in the United States, most people were exposed to the chicken pox virus in childhood, thereby developing a life-long immunity. Now, most children receive the chicken pox vaccine series starting at age one. After a childhood chicken pox infection or immunization series, most people never suffer from the virus again. However, in some people, for unknown reasons, the varicella virus can remain dormant within the long nerves of the body until some trigger allows for a localized outbreak of the virus, called shingles.

These outbreaks are usually isolated to the skin served by the nerve in which the virus has remained dormant. The outbreak starts as a focal area of severe pain or burning followed by a characteristic blistering rash over the affected strip of skin. In most cases the pain subsides in 2-10 days, but in a small percentage of patients, the outbreak can lead to a long-term pain syndrome called post-herpetic neuralgia.

Outbreaks usually occur in persons over age 60 with at least fifty percent of people who reach age 85 experiencing at least one attack. Younger people with a weakened immune system caused by illness or immunosuppressive medical therapy may also experience attacks of shingles.

Shingles is treated with antiviral medication and pain medication to reduce the duration and severity of the outbreak.

A person with an active shingles rash is contagious and must avoid contact with others who could be harmed by a VZV infection particularly infants, pregnant women, and anyone with a compromised immune system.

In theory, the shingles vaccine helps boost the immunity of a person who has had prior VZV exposure. It is approved by the FDA for administration to adults age 60 and over. Early studies on the vaccine show that it reduces the incidence of shingles by 51.3 percent and the feared complication of post-herpetic neuralgia by 66.5 percent. Like many other vaccines, large numbers of people must be vaccinated to realize a benefit in the whole population. According to research, 58 people have to receive the shingles vaccine to prevent one outbreak of shingles, and 364 people have to receive the vaccine to prevent one case of post-herpetic neuralgia.

Given that the risks associated with receiving the vaccine are minimal, there is likely little harm in giving the vaccine to large numbers of people; however, because so many have to be immunized to prevent one outbreak, experts debate on whether the vaccine is cost effective.

The effectiveness of the vaccine on persons under age 60 is unknown and is therefore not recommended by the FDA. Whether or not the shingles vaccine prevents future outbreaks in a person who has already suffered an attack of shingles is also unknown; however, the Center for Disease Control and Prevention recommends vaccination even if a prior attack has occurred.

The varicella zoster vaccine is available to patients in the Norton Sound region only by prescription. If you are over age 60, you may consider speaking with your provider at your next visit about the risks and potential benefits of receiving the shingles vaccine.

Bankruptcy

tlement. Nome's diocese-owned radio station KNOM took out a loan with CBNA to the tune of $150,000 to contribute to the fund (see story in this edition). The same amount came from the Catholic Schools of Fairbanks. The insurance carrier Alaska National Insurance Co. paid $1.4 million. Hannon said that the insurer first only offered $1 million, but then chipped in $400,000 more.

The diocese also put their Pilgrim Hot Springs property up for sale and started a sealed bidding process. Hannon estimated that the 320-acre property could fetch $1.8 million on the low end. The deadline to submit a bid is Feb. 24, 2010 at 5 p.m. The sealed bids will then be opened in the bankruptcy court in Anchorage. The buyer then has to transfer the complete amount to the settlement fund. Whatever amount the sale of Pilgrim Hot Springs is going to be, it is already included in the $9.8 million to be paid out to the victims. However, depending on a separate lawsuit, additional payments could reach the claimants.

Two other insurance carriers—Catholic Mutual and Traveler's Insurance—are balking at paying out insurance claims. Litigation against these two insurers is still ongoing and the questions that need to be cleared are which years the insurers have to cover and how much they have to pay. The diocese's human resource director, Ronnie Rosenberg, said that the diocese had begun the litigation, but now the creditors—or the committee of sexual abuse victims and their legal representation—have taken over the case. "We signed our rights [to the money] over to the claimants. Now it's the case of the sexual abuse survivors versus the insurance companies," Rosenberg explained.

Ken Roosa, attorney for the majority of the claimants, is now among those who take over the Bishop's claims and pursue them against the insurance companies in court. In reacting to the judge's signing off on the diocese's third amended reorganization plan, he was not jubilant. "While it was not entirely satisfactory, the claimants did not object to the consensual plan," Roosa said.

A court-appointed arbitrator is charged with the difficult task to decide how much every victim gets paid out. Rosenberg said that the arbitrator is familiar with the cases as he was also the person to decide the same when the Jesuits declared their $50 million settlement two years ago. Generally, the amount is decided as victims' cases are evaluated and categorized in three or four tiers, depending on the severity of the abuse, the age of the victim at the time and the time span over which the abuse happened.

Hannon expects the money to be paid out to the claimants by the end of this month or the beginning of March.

But writing checks is not all the diocese has to do. Non-monetary obligations of the diocese include posting a letter of apology on the CBNA website, they have to list all perpetrators by name and the Bishop is to embark on a journey to the villages to extend apologies and to conduct listening sessions. "We're going to be running very lean for a number of years, but in general, everybody is relieved to have the [bankruptcy proceedings] behind us," Hannon said. "Now we're re-focusing on the main issue before us and that is to look to the future, re-establish trust and to continue with our abuse prevention programs."

But in the light of very limited finances, this proves to be difficult. Rosenberg said that they are looking into grants to continue sexual abuse prevention programs in the rural areas. Due to budget constraints, a position at the diocese's

Children and Family Rights Center had to be cut, and there is nobody in Nome or the region to work these programs.

While CBNA completed the bankruptcy proceedings, the Society of Jesus, Oregon Province, which includes the states of Alaska, Idaho, Washington and Oregon, are at the beginning of their reorganization journey as they filed for Chapter 11 for the same reasons as the CBNA. At the end of the creditors' filing period, the Jesuits have tallied nearly 600 claims of sexual abuse.

Roosa also has clients involved in this case, and he said that the parties are just getting started on the post claim evaluation and there is no telling when their bankruptcy gets resolved.

Bishop.

Schmidt said the main idea behind the establishment of KNOM Radio Mission Inc., is to assure listeners and the region that there will be a local radio station in the future. "What we're doing here is to make sure that we are here for years and years to come," Schmidt said. He said he had the idea a few years ago, wrote a business plan, but then the CBNA filing for bankruptcy froze the proceedings. "The idea is that we establish a new identity, but do the same thing and guarantee that it will be here no matter what."

The plan is to get the paperwork with the IRS, FCC and negotiations with the CBNA squared away. Schmidt said buying the radio station would be an expense in the ballpark of $580,000 and that plans are to hold a one-time local fundraiser to come up with the money for the capital purchase. After that, a local board would be elected and be in charge to run the organization. Beyond that, Schmidt plans to come up with operating funds through fundraising efforts and donors in the Lower 48.

benefits of the road the improvement of passenger transportation, fuel delivery, freight and mail delivery, mining support and improved energy and power infrastructure.

The so-called Western Alaska Access Planning study was funded by the DOT with $1 million last year and was done by DOWL HKM and various other sub-contractors for the Department of Transportation. The study first identified four routes, but went for the Yukon River corridor route "because it most directly meets the project purpose, has significant potential benefits and minimizes environmental and land management impacts," the document says. Planners say that it provides the most direct access between Fairbanks and Nome, and would connect numerous communities and resources along the way. The study also said that the route is well suited for phased construction and has potential to link barge traffic on the Yukon River and connections to the Donlin Creek and the Ambler mining district.

The firm Northern Economics studied the economic benefits, and while Nome would have zero savings for fuel delivery—the fuel would still arrive via barge—the study forecasts that the community could save almost $8 million annually in cargo expenses and $7 million in bypass mail, meaning savings of almost $15 million.

The study paid close attention to benefits to the Donlin Creek mining district. It suggests that a road corridor would reduce the costs of building a pipeline by $1 billion and cut the cost to build power transmissions from Manley Hot Springs to Donlin in half to $100 million. According to the study's map, the road would pass through seven significant mineral occurrences and a road would open up new possibilities to mining companies. However, the study didn't explore the possibility to involve the private sector to chip in when mineral companies are clear to benefit from a road to Nome. The Anchorage Daily News reported that Senator Johnny Ellis (D-Anchorage) found the price tag shocking and mentioned that he'd like to see the private sector kick in some money, as mining does not contribute significant amounts to the state treasury.

The study dismissed the possibility of a rail connection. The document says that a road would be more practical and cost effective because a railroad would need a different route at higher construction costs per mile. But the planners did not rule out a future rail line along the road.

As a down side, planners mention negative socioeconomic effects. The study says that there would be some negative effects to subsistence and "social disruption effects." But the planners opine that these are balanced by the positive effects of large-scale mining and resource development, that the road would increase access to public services and that it would reduce costs of other community capital improvements.

Also, in theory, the road is proposed to be open year round. Under the maintenance and operations considerations, the planners based their estimates on maintenance and operation costs along the Dalton Highway. They propose a maintenance facility to be built every 60 miles along the way, at a price tag of $15.5 million each, plus heavy equipment worth between $1.5 million and $2 million. The study does not propose how the DOT is supposed to keep the road to Nome open in harsh winter conditions with blowing snow along the coast or what the cost would be to keep the road open in all conditions.

The planners have outlined that more work is needed in terms of cost projections as construction would cut through 135 miles of rolling terrain, 65 miles of mountainous terrain and 185 miles of wetlands.

The authors of the study recommend to build on their report and that next steps should involve route mapping, engineering and environmental field studies, engineering analysis and public involvement. Former Gov. Sarah Palin had been pushing for the project last year and her successor Gov. Sean Parnell also supports the road west. Parnell included $1 million in his proposed budget to further study the possibility to get a road to Nome.

Nome road proposal deserves scrutiny

By Sen. Donald Olson

A proposal for a road to Nome from the Interior road system has resurfaced recently. This proposal has come up several times over the years, but this year, it comes with an elevated profile based on a push from Gov. Sean Parnell.

Like any big ticket project, this proposal merits considerable scrutiny.

There may be some genuine cost benefits for residents of the region—reduced food, fuel, and materials costs. There may also be benefits to regional tourism. And, certainly, there would likely be increased resource extraction, meaning training and jobs for area workers. As a public official, I am obliged to consider many aspects of proposals such as this one, and I take that responsibility seriously.

The governor recommends another $1 million detailed study on top of the $1 million spent already for the initial study. One would presume the additional study would concern itself with vital issues such as social impacts on communities along the route, impacts on fish and game stocks, and the effects of such a road on traditional lifestyle activities, including subsistence harvesting. How would the diversion of state funding to a project of this magnitude affect other transportation needs in the region? What level of public input and public meetings will be adequate for review of a project of this size and scope?

As public discussion and legislative scrutiny of this issue evolves, I will be actively seeking your continued input and participation.

Donald Olson is the state senator for Senate District T. He can be reached in his Juneau office at (800) 597-3707.

School board stands firm on replacing principals

By Tyler Rhodes

After four weeks of considerable noise, it was a moment of silence in the elementary school commons Tuesday night that cemented the school board's split vote of Jan. 12 to replace junior/senior high school principal Janeen Sullivan and assistant principal Doug Boyer next year.

The chances for the administrators' contracts to get the green light from the board were dashed when Barb Nickel's motion to rescind the Jan. 12 vote was met with sealed lips from her fellow board members. Board president Gloria Karmun twice asked for a second and was twice met with silence.

NSEDC approves major local and Bering Sea ventures

All parties and players in talks remain tight-lipped about the projects and money involved

By Laurie McNicholas

Last week the Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. board of directors gave green lights to two major business ventures after discussing them for at least six hours behind closed doors during their quarterly meeting in Nome.

One venture involves Nomeites Cussy Kauer, Ginny and Carl Emmons, Charlie Reader and Charles Fagerstrom. They presented their proposal to the NSEDC executive committee in an hour-long executive session closed to the public Feb. 2 and to the full board in an hour-long closed session Feb. 4. The board unanimously approved the proposal Feb. 5 after discussing it for about an hour in executive session.

Secrecy surrounds the purpose of the venture. NSEDC President and Board Chairman Dan Harrelson told The Nome Nugget the group requested confidentiality, Fagerstrom declined comment at this time, and Kauer said, "It is confidential at this point."

It is no secret in Nome that local residents and NovaGold representatives are discussing the purchase of some of the mining com-

NJUS prepares to tank up with $2.50 fuel

By Sandra L. Medearis

Nome's kilowatt vendors have signed a contract for next winter's fuel to keep utility generators spinning and our lights on.

The contract price for fuel delivered that meets Nome Joint Utility specifications, verified by an independent lab, will be around $2.4914 per gallon for a delivery of 1.6 million to 2.2 million gallons of diesel oil. This puts the total purchase in the ballpark of $4 million to $5.5 million.

The final price will be adjusted on a formula that takes in the average daily trading price of heating oil during July on the New York Mercantile Exchange. The price could drop if the gross heating value per gallon tests below a certain baseline.

Delta-Western submitted the winning bid to Western Alaska Fuel Group, a purchasing consortium that includes NJUS, Kotzebue and Dillingham. WAFG and suppliers have historically used the day of lifting the fuel to the barge, and recently a three-day average wrap. Vendors have been proposing a variety of pricing methods-month, five to seven days, 30 days' average, according to John K. Handeland, utility manager.

Residents of Nome,

As a young child I had to attend boarding school along with students of King Island and Mary's Igloo. I was not only offended by your editorial in your paper. We (Bryan and RoseAnn Timbers) had the privilege, opportunity, honor to raise our two children Greg and Kirsten in Nome and they both graduated with honors from Nome-Beltz High School and also graduated from college with honors.

We as parents involved in boards and committed to improve everyone's lives. I was so honored that my daughter Kirsten committed herself to run for the school board. I watched her read all of her information, attended many work sessions, prepared for all board meetings and to her best of all abilities do the best as she was raised to contribute back to what her passion of educational opportunities, dedication and commitment to being raised in Solomon and Nome.

I also want to support Albert Mc-Comas, Heather and my daughter to support their decisions for the betterment of all of Nome and the Nome Education goals and opportunities offered to all. Sincerely,

RoseAnn S. Timbers Solomon/Nome resident since birth

Dear Editor,

Along with everyone else in this community I have my opinions on this school board issue. I think that it is important to look at it from every angle. In my mind, when I analyze any situation I try and put myself in all shoes. I have held back from responding to letters in the newspaper, until I read the editorial in last week's paper.

I understand your (along with many others') feelings of rage, but degrading young women who are leaders in our community is completely unnecessary. When you implied that Kirsten Timbers and Heather Payenna are "...vindictive baby girls..." to me, you are implying this about me and many others that fall in our age group. They represent us. And this word, "vindictive", I am sick of hearing. Do you, editor personally know these two fine young women? Do any of you, who have personally attacked these ladies, personally know them?

These two educated Native women are products of this community and both are alumni from NBHS. They both have been through the Nome Public Schools system since kindergarten, later excelling in life. Kirsten graduated with a B.A. in Sociology and Human Service from Fort Lewis College, and Heather with a B.A. in History from the University of Hawaii, both under the age of 25. And the fact that these college graduates actually moved back to Nome to serve our community is inspiring and what I believe to be the actual goal for our youth. Education doesn't end here for Kirsten or Heather. In the future, they plan to eventually obtain master's degrees.

An NPS teacher stated, "No one under the age of 25 should even be allowed in a leadership position.... and another teacher's wife referred to these board members as a "...former high school drunk" and "a wanna be cheerleader (kiss butt)... They were both publicly posted on the internet. These comments were circulated by people who I thought to be mature adults and/or parents of children who will one day fall in the same age range and perhaps want to be leaders themselves. When I say "leaders" this isn't limited to running for the school board, but rather the numerous boards, councils and clubs that many people reside on throughout our region.

All of these personal attacks via email, internet posts, letters/editorials in The Nome Nugget, and phone calls even being made at their place of work, are just as "hurtful, irresponsible and ignorant" as Nancy McGuire described the result of the board's decision.

My intent of this letter is not to rush to the defense of these two specific individuals, but rather to the defense of the people that fall within these stereotypes. I took personal offense to these labels being placed on them. I believe that everyone is entitled to voice their own opinion, but if you hold yourself to be a mature adul, then have a little respect when doing

Letter to the editor:

In two columns dated January 7 and 14, Jason Evans wrote about what he believes to be the correct relationship between a board and its chief executive officer (CEO) and the fiduciary responsibilities of board members. Fiduciary responsibility is a legal term whereby financial institutions, trustees, board members, and guardians are required to put the interest of the client, corporation, or charge first. As a board member with a potential conflict of interest in a matter being discussed, they must disclose it at the beginning of the discussion. The rest of the board then determines if they want the board member to excuse him/herself from the discussion.

Jason mentions conflict of interest and board members serving as employees. My former father-in-law was the chairman of the board, president and CEO of Pfizer. He was both an employee and board member, which I understand is fairly common among Fortune 500 companies. He was the chair and president when Viagra was developed and brought to market. Bob Dole volunteered to be in the ad campaign. In the rest of the world, serving as a board member and employee is not a problem as Jason implies.

I studied corporate law in law school, and have a good understanding of the responsibilities of forprofit and non-profit board members. Our ANCSA corporations are different than other corporations, as we did not voluntarily invest capital by buying shares. The corporations were basically set up to seek profit for shareholders and serve as stewards for the land granted to them under ANCSA. While BSNC experienced financial problems in the past, we have been very fortunate that our corporation has grown under the 8a program.

I think our board members have been looking out for our best interests and have done a great job turning around BSNC's finances. I've been to the regional offices in Anchorage and see many of our shareholders working there from communities throughout our region.

The columns Jason Evans wrote imply there is something wrong. If there is, it's his fiduciary duty to our shareholders to tell us what is going on so that it can be addressed.

process. Hopefully the board could spare themselves the embarrassment and have the courtesy to resign. It would do the community a favor. We can do without telephonic participation from Kentucky. However, while we are getting the school board cleaned up we can't forget the other important decisions facing our town.

We have to make plans that will impact the way we live and do business in Nome. There is a new state office building in the works. Where should it be built? Should it go on the Gold Company land at the north end of Steadman near Sixth Ave.? Should it go downtown on Front Street where it would be close to the court, post office, banks and other offices? Should it be one big building or several small buildings downtown? Should the current state building be renovated and expanded? Should we keep the land to the north of town as a residential area? What about playgrounds? Are we really going to build a new bridge over the Snake River and then move the river? Will the Coast Guard ever have a permanent presence here? Will we annex Rock Creek?

There are many important decisions to make. We need public input to plan for the way Nome will be 10, 15, 20 and more years from now. We have a stake in the future and a responsibility to make Nome a town we are proud to live in and be our home. Let's get involved in local government. -N.L.M.-

Iditarod Air Force gets threeyear exemption from FAA

The Federal Aviation Administration has granted the Iditarod Air Force a three-year exemption to fly in support of the Iditarod Trail Sled Dog Race. The all-volunteer Iditarod Air Force has been flying in support of the race for more than 20 years, but has had to apply for exemptions from the FAA for the past two years to do so. FAA regulations prohibit volunteer pilots from accepting any cost deferments such as fuel, accommodations and food. After the 2012 race, the FAA exemption to these rules will expire. The Iditarod Air Force flies food and fuel to checkpoints for both dogs and mushers, transports volunteers, judges, and veterinarians as well as moves dropped and scratched dogs.

U.S. Army Corps of Engineers denies permit to ConocoPhillips to NPR-A

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers. Alaska District has denied the permit application from ConocoPhillips Alaska Inc. to construct a drill pad west of the Colville River Delta. The drill pad was supposed to expand the Alpine petroleum field on the North Slope. The Corps justified its denial of the permit saying that there are other practicable alternatives such as horizontal directional drilling that would have less adverse impact on the aquatic ecosystem and still meet the project purpose.

The denial sparked outrage in high places. Gov. Sean Parnell said in a statement that the state has recently fought the federal government for tying up Outer Continental Shelf leasing, and for adding bureaucratic "nightmares" and costs with Endangered Species Act listings and critical habitat area designations. Parnell said that with its decision, the Corps continues to set back the nation's chances for economic recovery, domestic energy production and Alaskans' prospects for jobs.

U.S. Sens. Lisa Murkowski and

Mark Begich weren't happy with the permit denial, either, and state Legislature House Speaker Mike Chenault, R-Nikiski, and House Resources Committee co-chair Craig Johnson, R-Anchorage, vented their anger and frustration, saying it would be bad news for Alaskans.

The Corps proposed that other alternatives with fewer environmental impacts could include horizontal, directional drilling, but this would require new permit applications. These alternatives minimize impacts to the Colville River Delta, which is the largest and most complex delta on the Arctic Coastal Plain and drains nearly 30 percent of the North Slope. The delta serves as habitat for approximately 80 species of birds, numerous fish, migrating caribou and is within the subsistence hunting and fishing areas of the village of Nuiqsut. The delta also represents nearly 70 percent of overwintering fish habitat within the North Slope.

Begich urges Alaska legislators to protect campaign finance laws

Last week, U.S. Sen. Mark Begich sent a letter to all members of the Alaska State Legislature and to Gov. Sean Parnell urging them to make sure the intent of Alaska's strict campaign finance laws remain intact following a recent U.S. Supreme Court ruling. Three weeks ago the nation's highest court issued a decision allowing corporations to spend freely to support or oppose candidates running for Congress or president. Under the Supreme Court ruling, corporations and unions can't give directly to candidates, but are allowed to spend unlimited amounts on advertisements for or against those on the ballot. Last week, a legislative legal opinion was released in Alaska saying Alaska's own statues might not be enforced following the Supreme Court's decision. Begich said that allowing corporate money special interests to exercise too much influence over American political campaigns is a shameful step backward.

Begich said he is particularly concerned about the view in Alaska that there will not only be no limits on independent expenditures by for-profit corporations, but also no statutory disclosures identifying the contributors or reporting requirements for the corporations. Begich asked Alaska legislators to take up the issue this legislative session to ensure Alaska's campaign finance laws remain as strong as they were before the Supreme Court decision. Following the Supreme Court ruling, Alaska's ban on corporate contributions has been challenged by the Wasillabased Conservative Patriots Group. The Anchorage Daily News reports that they asked the Alaska Public Offices Commission to rewrite the regulations by Feb. 15 so the group can support candidates for Anchorage Assembly in the April municipal election. At this point the federal finding contradicts Alaska law and the Alaska attorney general's office is in the process of reviewing the Supreme Court ruling and what it means for state elections.

Mary's Igloo to get shelter

The Alaska Division of Parks and Outdoor Recreation last week announced that it awarded funds from the 2010 recreational trail grants to build a Shelter Cabin at New Igloo. The cabin will be a 16-by-20-foot emergency shelter for public use. Once the cabin is built, the grant includes the installation of permanent trail markers from Teller to the New Igloo cabin site. The Native Village of Mary's Igloo was awarded $21,449 for this project.

Nome Elementary School fifthgrader Joshua Bourdon and junior high eighth-grader Jenny Yi will represent Nome this year in the Alaska State Spelling Bee.

Bourdon and Yi battled their way through the rounds to be given their respective titles Feb. 5 during the Nome Parent Teacher Student Association Spelling Bee. Fourth-grader Dane Robinson earned runner-up honors in the elementary division, while Tristan Matson scored second for the junior high students.

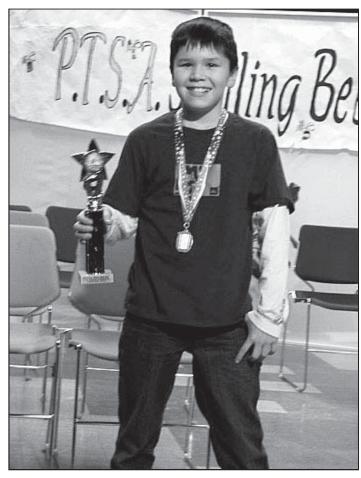

Grade level winners were Brayden Bahnke, third grade; Dane Robinson, fourth grade; Joshua Bourdon, fifth grade; Jeremy Knudsen and Degnan Lawrence (tie), sixth

This year's bee was coordinated by Susan Rand. Diana Adams was the pronouncer. Ian McRae, Sharon Penttila and Jake Rand served as judges. Betsy Brennan, Sandi Keller and Barb Nickels kept score. Richard Beneville provided technical assistance and set-up. Refreshments were provided by Lori Head, Monica Rose and Josie Bourdon.

prove the contracts, could have herself offered the second to bring the motion to the table. Even so, by allowing Nickels' motion to die, the three board members who initially voted to replace the principals—Albert McComas, Kirsten Timbers and Heather Payenna—showed they were not going to change their minds.

The contracts were back on the agenda Feb. 9 after an informal polling of members at the Jan. 26 meeting showed that Karmun, Timbers and Nickels supported another look at the issue.

Although not as packed as it was two weeks earlier, the commons at Nome Elementary School again seated an abnormally large turnout for a school board meeting. While at least 70 approached the board to comment at that Jan. 26 session, just more than 20 individuals out of the approximately 100 in the room stepped up to the microphones Tuesday evening. The commentary, however, was much the same.

Nearly all who spoke did so in support of the two administrators. Many asked for the board members' justification in denying the contracts after Sullivan and Boyer had received glowing evaluations and the recommendation for retention from superintendent Jon Wehde. "The weight of the world is on your shoulders, but you got to know that it's on all of ours too," parent Mari Lammer said to the board. "We're just looking for an answer or a reason.... I don't distrust any of you, but I'm just looking for a reason."

The initial 3-2 vote to seek new administrators for Nome-Beltz came Jan. 12 after the board members went behind closed doors for nearly an hour and a half. Neither Sullivan nor Boyer, who were both in attendance at the Jan. 12 meeting, were invited into the executive session. The votes proceeded after the private session with no board discussion aired in the public meeting.

Karmun had called the executive session to discuss personnel matters. Board members have cited that since the discussion was over personnel issues they are unable to offer the justification behind the votes for the administrators' removal. Board member Nickels has been vocal in contending that she believes the two should be retained. "Having been in the executive session, I still couldn't come up with the reason why we made the decision we did," she said Tuesday evening.

Joining many community members, both Boyer and Sullivan, to no avail, have addressed the school board to ask why they were not retained. Boyer took the microphone Tuesday to again make the plea. "I have three kids. I have to feed my kids next year. I just need to know the reason why," he said. "If you were in my place—if you had a job one day and didn't the next without knowing the reason why—I think you would be asking the same thing."

Two of the 21 community members to speak Tuesday did rise to support the board's initial vote. Leo and Erna Rasmussen each took to the microphone to back the board. Erna Rasmussen did so quickly, simply saying she wanted a letter entered into the record. Leo Rasmussen, a former mayor, lauded the members who voted to not renew the contracts. "I'm proud you've had the guts to test the will of the public. You were elected to do that," he said to a trickle of applause.

Nome resident and business owner Matt Tomter disagreed. "Testing the will of the people, it's not really what it's about. It's about running the school," he said. "... You guys have a process to follow. The decisions you make affect everyone in this room and every kid in the school district and every kid who is about to go into the school district. ... Not to follow the process is wrong."

The majority of the board's decision on the contracts pushed parent David Head to not follow the meeting's process. A few minutes after the board had moved on from the contracts, Head rose, grabbed the microphone and called for a recall of certain board members, interrupting discussion of another matter. Despite Karmun's insistence that he was out of order, Head continued. "There are no policies here, so I can talk," Head replied before walking out of the room to applause and some condemnation.

Many in the audience questioned what they saw as the board circumventing its process in handling personnel matters. The duty of evaluating and dealing with complaints regarding administrators normally falls to the superintendent, who then reports to the board. Wehde had recommended both Sullivan and Boyer be retained for next year.

Betsy Brennan, a frequent attendee at board meetings and a former board member, said she believed the vote sidestepped the normal handling of contracts. "I feel the process was flawed. Certainly board policy was not followed. Certainly an executive session was called when the personnel were not invited to come into the session," she said.

Of the critiques aimed at Sullivan and Boyer at the more heavily attended Jan. 26 meeting were complaints of students falling through the cracks and a disregard for dropouts. Boyer argued that he is succeeding in the two main tasks for which he was hired. "My job is to lower discipline [problems] and try and keep kids in school. Discipline numbers are down. I have been working with different agencies trying to keep kids in school and trying to get kids back to school," he said. "Kids aren't sleeping in class. Kids aren't cussing down the hallways."

Besides thanking the public for their participation and comments, the majority of the board did not speak to the issue that brought most to Tuesday's meeting.

Nickels, however, again departed from her follow members. In her closing comments, she pointed out that Gov. Sean Parnell had declared February as "School Board Recognition Month." Citing an article in an Alaska Association of School Boards newsletter, Nickels read a passage referring to citizens working with local school boards. "I only wish the Nome Board of Education used their role as intended and had ensured a continuing commitment to local citizen control and decision-making," Nickels said.

What now

Following the board's silence on bringing Sullivan's and Boyer's administrative contracts up for another vote, they did unanimously approve all the tenured teacher contracts before them. Sullivan's name was among those on the list.

Wehde said since Sullivan is a tenured and accredited employee with the district she has the right to remain employed as a teacher. Wehde said he would work to fit her in with a position that is in line with the district's soon-to-be-approved strategic plan.

Wende also said the district is moving forward with the hiring process for a new administrative team for Nome-Beltz. He said the district has so far received approximately 30 applications for each position, some from Alaska, some from out of state. He said plans are to do a first round of interviews with candidates via teleconference with a committee made up of, among others, himself, one or two school board members, district personnel officer Bill Gartung, administrator Jon Berkeley.

Once the field is narrowed to three or so candidates for each position, those prospective administrators will be interviewed in person for the positions. "This has to be a completely thorough process," Wehde said.

"Based on price index history, the group felt that July prices were most favorable and a 30day average more favorable," he said. "Delta-Western will tell us the lift date and we will set the quantities then."

Handeland also explained that negotiations with the supplier set their profit at 53 cents per gallon plus whatever happened in the NYMEX market. In the past, the price on the day of lifting has linked to a different fuel market index from Seattle, but this year WAFG hired an economist to evaluate several indices and deemed a NYMEX price prediction more favorable, as that exchange had more action than OPIS out of Seattle.

Handeland told the NJUS Board of Directors, who approved the contract at their Feb. 4 meeting, that NJUS staff would consider power coming onto the grid from the Banner Wind Farm in setting the volume to be purchased. If predicted output from the wind turbines materializes, NJUS generators will use about 125,000 fewer gallons of fuel over the next year.

NJUS has decided not to join a Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. fuel purchase group this year, an alliance that has been under consideration.

"Our product is unique," Handeland said.

"The potential of splitting with those utilities is not in our interest. Our fuel has lower sulfur content, and based on the volume we require, there are economic advantages to the supplier being able to use the whole barge instead of having to split out the orders."

Handeland told the board that a deal could work out where NSEDC would finance the Nome purchase at a very low interest rate even if the utility did not use their purchase program. "Well, I hope the July price is real low," NJUS board member Carl Emmons said.

The NJUS staff based 2010 budget projections on $3 per gallon, according to Handeland, as fuel prices seemed to be "on the rise."

On Feb. 4, the NJUS board handed the Nome Common Council a spending plan for operations and maintenance that shows estimated revenues of $13.5 million, reduced by about $320,000 from FY09 projected revenue, against operations and maintenance expenses of $12.8 million, slightly down from projected '09, including provisions for depreciation in the amount of about $4.7 million, which results in a net margin of $720,000.

Net margin and non-cash amortizations will fund the 2010 capital improvements budget, annual bond and debt service payments, fuel inventory and grant program local participation. The operation and maintenance budget does not include these items.

child by at least two separate acts, and one of the acts resulted in the death of the child."

On Sept. 20, 2009, a family member found Harley's mother, Tammy Dickson, 22, unresponsive. A health aide was called to the scene but was not successful in attempts to revive Tammy Dickson.

Alaska State Troopers declined to say how the death occurred and that an investigation was in progress. Community members, however, reported that Dickson had hanged herself in an apparent suicide.

On Oct. 14, 2009, Lee filed a motion for dismissal of his indictment, saying that hearsay testirecorded testimony mony, presented to the July 17 grand jury, from Tammy Dickson, should not be admitted. Tammy Dickson did not appear before the grand jury. Judge Ben Esch ruled that Dickson was unavailable and had a Fifth Amendment privilege not to testify. At grand jury, an Alaska State Trooper investigator, Mark Granda summarized Tammy Dickson's testimony and played a recording. Lee's motion was denied.

In a subsequent motion, Lee asked for additional discovery, access to records on investigation of Tammy Dickson's suicide, so that defense could review them for her state of mind at the time of her suicide and have use of the records in defense of acts alleged against Lee that were committed by an alternate perpetrator.

Judge Esch ruled Lee could have access to records in possession of the state, but medical records fall under Tammy Dickson's right to privacy and that right extends to surviving family members. The state does not have the medical records. Dickson's personal representative has the power to waive the right.

According to court documents, Lee was interviewed by Troopers on two occasions and also by an Anchorage Police Department Officer Patrick Roberts. The grand jury heard the Trooper interviews, but Mark Granda, Trooper investigator, did not mention the interview with Roberts. In another motion for dismissal, Lee argued that the grand jury was left with the impression that they had all the evidence Lee was willing to provide to medical and police personnel, that Lee's consistent denial from the day Harley Dickson entered the hospital to eight months later of any involvement in the baby's death was not provided the grand jury. The state has argued that all three interviews produced the same, except that in one interview Lee denied drinking. A ruling on this motion is pending.

A Teller village health aide answered a report on Oct. 12, 2008, according to court documents, that Harley Dickson had stopped breathing and was foaming at the mouth. The health aide went to the residence of Frank David Lee and Tammy Dickson. The baby was not breathing, according to documents.

The health worker started rescue breathing. The baby was taken to the clinic and then medivaced directly to Anchorage.

In Anchorage, Barbara Coopes, an acute care pediatrician, treated Harley Dickson. She told the grand jury that the baby arrived at the hospital with a coma and respiratory failure, meaning he was on life support, according to court papers. She said he had injuries to his eyes and brain swelling. Dr. Coopes testified that, in her opinion, the baby had been shaken.

Shaken Baby Syndrome is a form of child abuse where the abuser violently shakes a baby or small child creating a whiplash motion causing acceleration-deceleration injuries that can lead to death or severe brain injuries.

Dr. Coopes, according to court records, said her opinion was that

Lee's explanations concerning his running outside with the baby in a panic October 2008 did not explain the injuries.

A pre-trial omnibus hearing for Lee's case is slated for Feb. 12 at 9 a.m. in the Nome Courthouse before Judge Esch.

Icicle Seafoods revives Norton Sound herring sac roe fishery

Norton Sound Economic Development Corporation board addresses regional fisheries issues

By Laurie McNicholas

The Alaska Department of Fish and Game will open a commercial fishery for herring sac roe in Norton Sound this spring because Icicle Seafoods will provide a market for the product, reports Jim Menard, area manager for Norton Sound and Kotzebue.

The region's once lively sac roe fishery died for lack of a market several years ago.

The Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. board approved terms of a contract with Icicle Seafoods at a meeting last week in Nome. Menard told the board he is working with state and federal agencies to obtain a waiver for Icicle Seafoods to send a herring processor into eastern Norton Sound waters—a critical habitat area for spectacled eider. The bird was listed as a threatened species under the Endangered Species Act in 2001.

Regulations restrict discharges of gray water into waters less than 60 feet deep in a critical habitat area, but Menard said most eiders will not arrive there until after the fishery ends. It usually closes at the end of May, he added.

The Alaska Department of Environmental Conservation gave preliminary approval for a waiver for Icicle Seafoods Feb. 8 and sent the request to the Environmental Protection Agency and the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, Menard reports.

He said the sac roe fishery is staged at Cape Denbigh or in the Stebbins and St. Michael area depending on ice conditions. The harvest quota for Norton Sound herring is an ample 7,000 tons.

Icicle Seafoods will want to place its processing vessel in the lee of Bosboro Island to protect it from stormy weather, Menard said. Waters in the area are only about 50 feet deep, and they are shallow throughout Norton Sound, he noted. He said tenders can't run long distances to deliver catches to a processor.

Unalakleet River weir

A four-year assessment project for Unalakleet River Chinook (king) salmon will begin this summer with installation of a floating weir on the Unalakleet River, reported Scott Kent, ADF&G's assistant area manager for Norton Sound. Kent said the Native Village of Unalakleet fully endorses the weir and will receive $204,000 of the total $619,000 in project funds to employ two fisheries technicians. A long-term plan is to help NVU secure funding for a local biologist who can run the project, he added

Kent said NSEDC is providing matching funds by counting salmon at the North River tower, a tributary of the Unalakleet River, and the Bureau of Land Management will fund a technician to help with weir operations. He thanked Paul Ivanoff and Middy Johnson, NSEDC employees in Unalakleet, for their unswerving support of the study. The Office of Subsistence Management approved funding for the project last month.

Kent said the weir will be fabricated in Unalakleet with installation scheduled in mid-June. Twenty new panels for the Pilgrim River weir also will be fabricated this spring in Unalakleet, he added.

In the past decade, king salmon returns to the Unalakleet River have declined steeply to a level that precludes commercial fishing and severely restricts subsistence and sport fishing, Kent notes in a written project description. The project aims to obtain estimates of the abundance and age, sex and length (ASL) composition from spawning Unalakleet River kings. ASL and escapement data from weirs are considered the least biased and most accurate. The data will be used to determine spawning goals and examine trends in relation to environmental changes and harvest practices.

Nome boat ramp

The NSEDC executive committee discussed a request from fishermen for an additional boat ramp in Nome. Paul Ivanoff, NSEDC community benefits director, said fishermen want a ramp in the outer harbor, which stays ice-free for three to four weeks longer than the inner harbor, so they can fish later in the season. The fishermen say the existing boat ramp is used by miners and recreational boaters and is inaccessible at times, Ivanoff added.

The City of Nome says the Army Corps of Engineers won't issue a permit for a boat ramp in the outer harbor, reported NSEDC Chief Operating Officer Simon Kinneen. "There is a potential for a third armored pier in the future," he added.

Dan Harrelson, NSEDC president and board chairman, said he has heard that a company parks its barges at the boat ramp. Charlie Lean, who is director of Fisheries Development and Research for NSEDC and a member of the Nome Port Commission, said the ramp originally was built as a landing ramp for barges, so it is steep. He said there is talk of building a new ramp next to the current ramp at a shallower angle and separating them with pylons. A survey for a new ramp has been completed, he noted.

Kinneen pegged the estimated cost for a new ramp at $500,000.

Lean said the Corps of Engineers does not want to place a ramp in the outer harbor because it would have to dredge away the beach and pave over riprap, creating a ramp in both directions.

Harrelson asked Kinneen to meet with Nome fishermen and tell them they can opt for a second ramp next to the existing one or wait until a third armored pier is built. Kinneen said he will ask a city representative to attend the meeting.

Community welders project

Five communities have accepted NSEDC's offer to provide each of them with a welder package valued at about $11,000, reported Paul Ivanoff. They are Golovin, Elim, Koyuk, Savoonga and White Mountain. The package includes a welder, generator, welding supplies and a trailer. It was developed because some communities said they need welders to repair small boats and carts, Ivanoff said.

If a community doesn't need a welder project, the city council may submit a proposal for alternate equipment within a budget guideline of $11,000, he added.

Chief executive officer Janis Ivanoff said NSEDC's education, employment and training unit is developing a welder training program for villagers. The NSEDC board directed staff to provide welder packages to the five communities that have requested them.

Boat trailer funded

Nome fisherman Frank McFarland thanked the NSEDC board for providing the Norton Sound Marine Harvesters Association with funds to purchase a new boat trailer. He later told The Nome Nugget that the association's trailer had been damaged late last October while hauling a boat used for beach mining out of ice at the boat ramp.

"The harbor was all frozen in ice from channel to boat ramp," McFarland said. "The Bad Chicken kept slipping, then three of the rams broke and put holes in the boat." The boat has a fiberglass hull.

The broken trailer is tied up in an insurance claim, but McFarland thinks it will be useable eventually. Its steel hydraulic rams were used to lift a boat out of the water and transfer its weight to the trailer so it could be pulled up onto land.

McFarland said he asked NSEDC for $61,000 to repair the damaged trailer and an older trailer that needs new axels, and to maintain both trailers for 10 years, but NSEDC gave him that amount to buy a new trailer. The damaged trailer cost more than $61,000 and the association has no matching funds, so it will need to buy a used trailer or a smaller one, McFarland said.

Crabbers miss bonus

McFarland was among three crab fishermen who asked the NSEDC board to reconsider a decision not to pay a post-season bonus for their crab catch, which they sold to the company's processing plant in Nome. He provided figures for his fish ticket receipts from crab and halibut deliveries and a list of expenses such as crew payments, fuel and insurance that showed he took home only 20 percent of his gross income after four to five months of fishing.

Eric Osborne said Norton Sound crab fishermen are paid a lot less that the grounds price paid for Bristol Bay crab. A two-week fishing closure at the beginning of the crabbing season caused financial hardship for harvesters, he added. Osborne said NSEDC paid $1.50 per pound for silver salmon, double the statewide average price, except for troll-caught silvers in Southeastern Alaska.

Wilma Osborne noted that she and her husband, Eric, have four children. She said when the Unalakleet plant pays silver salmon fishermen a bonus and crab fishermen receive no bonus, it impacts her and the children. She said receiving a post-season crab bonus is like a Permanent Fund Dividend or Christmas; it's a big celebration. "I feel I was not invited to the celebration," she added.

Robin Thomas said Norton Sound crabbers receive the lowest ground prices in the state. Noting that it is hard to operate with high overhead expenses, he said NSEDC should pay fishermen at least the average state price for crab plus a cost-of-living adjustment.

Harrelson said before the crab season began last year, the board decided to get away from bonuses and give fishermen a good grounds price. "At December meetings after listening to testimony from fishermen, the board said no poundage bonus for crab, halibut or salmon fishermen," he added. He said silver salmon prices were up and down for the whole season, so the price per pound paid to silver salmon fishermen was adjusted throughout the season.

EGGS: Unscrambling the Research

By Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

Do you need a compact, easy-toprepare, whole food likely to improve your memory, help your eyesight, and lead to weight loss? Eggs may be your super food.

Eggs have spent several decades on an often-misunderstood list of foods thought to increase a person's risk of heart disease. This is because eggs are loaded with cholesterol, and it is known that certain forms of cholesterol in the blood stream are associated with a higher risk of cardiovascular disease. Traditionally, medical professionals assumed harmful cholesterol levels in the blood were related to high levels of cholesterol in the diet. This led the American Heart Association to recommend a limit on cholesterol consumption to 300 milligrams (mg) or less per day in otherwise healthy individuals. The problem is that a single large egg has 212mg of cholesterol, meaning a person eating a two-egg omelet will break the daily AHA recommendation before finishing breakfast.

Fortunately for egg-lovers, research over the last several decades has not supported a dietary restriction on eggs for most people. In fact, in 1999, JAMA published an important study of 120,000 men and women showing that consumption of up to 7 eggs a week does not increase the risk of heart disease or stroke in otherwise healthy people. The only increase in risk was seen in patients with diabetes. Various studies since then show that though eggs may cause an increase in overall cholesterol in about 30 percent of people, the increase occurs in both good (HDL) and bad (LDL) cholesterol so that the overall risk of heart disease remains unchanged.

Cholesterol may be the most infamous component of eggs. But from a health point of view, the average egg, at only 71 calories, has a long list of vitamins, minerals, and nutrients that promotes overall wellbeing.

The typical large egg has 6 grams of protein and 3.5 grams of healthy unsaturated fats. The fat-soluble vitamins A, D, E, and K are concentrated in eggs. Eggs are also a good source of B vitamins, zinc, iron, and folate.

Eggs likely improve and maintain eye health. Egg yolks are a rich source of lutein and zeaxanthin, relatives of beta-carotene, which have been linked to a reduced risk of age-related macular degeneration. A study published last year in the American Journal of Clinical Nutrition reported that patients who consumed 2 to 4 eggs a day for 5 weeks showed an improvement in the health of the retina of the eye.

Eggs are also a rich source of choline, an essential nutrient thought to improve memory and support healthy muscle function.

Interestingly, egg consumption may also provide one of the secrets to weight loss. Eating eggs causes a person to feel full longer. In a 2005 study published in the Journal of the American College of Nutrition, researchers found that subjects who consumed two eggs for breakfast felt full longer and ate less over the next 36 hours than others who ate a bagelbased breakfast with the same number of calories. Subsequent research by these scientists showed that people who consumed eggs for breakfast lost 65 percent more weight and maintained a higher level of energy compared to those who ate a bagel-based breakfast with the same number of calories.

Overall, the research supports the use of eggs in a healthy diet. Of course, this benefit does not extend to the bacon, sausage, hash browns, or other sources of saturated fat typically prepared with eggs. However, it does not take long to acquire a taste for eggs with a healthy mix of seasoning, onions, peppers, or tomatoes that will afford the greatest health benefit. So consider an egg for breakfast and be well.

pany's local assets, which include land and gravel. Rhylin Bailie, NovaGold's manager of corporate and investor relations, confirmed the rumors in an e-mail to the Nugget Feb. 8. "NovaGold has been approached by several parties interested in acquiring non-Rock Creek mine assets," she wrote.

A majority of NSEDC board members approved a major Bering Sea fisheries investment proposed by the company's wholly owned forprofit subsidiary, Siu Alaska Corp. Siu President and CEO John Eckels presented the proposal in a two-hour executive session Feb. 4. The NSEDC board discussed the proposal for an hour in executive session Feb. 5 and then approved the following motion by Nome's representative Don Stiles, who chairs the Siu board, seconded by Wilfred Katcheak of Stebbins.

"...that based on discussion held in executive session, the board approve Siu's proposal to guarantee a loan to Siu to purchase fisheries assets and fishing rights, and further that NSEDC purchase the crab quota associated with that asset." This motion gave approval to NSEDC to provide a loan guarantee to Siu.

Reggie Barr of Brevig Mission and Teller's Joe Garnie voted against the motion, Orville Ahkinga Jr. of Diomede abstained, and Truman Kava of Savoonga was absent. The 11 other NSEDC board members approved the proposal.

In response to the Nugget's request for information about the venture. Eckels wrote in an e-mail that Siu "is looking at an investment opportunity involved in the Bering Sea fisheries. We are very pleased that NSEDC has today seen fit to approve our request for the guarantee of a pending financing plan. We must emphasize that there are several significant hurdles before us, including regulatory approval, before the transaction can be closed. Due to confidentiality requirements between the parties and the ongoing sensitive negotiations, we are unable to disclose further details. Should we be successful in this opportunity, we look forward to issuing an announcement at the appropriate time."

During a public session at last week's board meeting, Eckels readily answered questions from Garnie about NSEDC's financial role in the 2008 purchase of the C/P Alaska Ocean by Glacier Fish Co. Siu holds NSEDC's 37.5 percent ownership interest in GFC. GFC's acquisition of the 376-foot Alaska Ocean increased the company's fleet of Bering Sea pollock harvesting catcher/processors to three vessels and its pollock holdings to 6.22 percent of the annual Bering Sea quota.

Garnie asked Eckels if NSEDC is in debt for the Alaska Ocean purchase.

"Yes, quite a bit of debt was taken on in the Alaska Ocean purchase; as I recall, about $150 million or so," Eckels replied.

Garnie asked if NSEDC owes the debt, and Eckels said GFC owes it. "There could be a capital call if Glacier Fish came to us and said they could not make payments," Eckels added. "NSEDC has not guaranteed any of that debt."

Garnie said he does not understand how NSEDC can own 37.5 percent of GFC and not owe any debt.

"Glacier Fish is responsible for making debt payments," Eckels replied. "If Glacier Fish does not have the funds to make payments, there could be a capital call [saying] 'we need more money."

Harrelson asked Eckels if the pay period for the debt is eight years, and Eckels said he thinks so. Harrelson said the faster the debt is paid off the larger will be the distribution of profits from Glacier Fish back to Siu.

Eckels said GFC officials are pleased with the company's current position despite an 18 percent decline in the total allowable catch of pollock and a decline in market prices. "They have done a good job of cost control," he added. "At the last meeting I said 2010 would bring a capital call possibly, but now Glacier Fish is quite pleased." He said GFC has no expectations for a capital call in projections for this year.

Aleutian No. 1 report

Siu holds NSEDC's 50 percent ownership interest in the Aleutian No. 1, which harvests golden (brown) king crab and opilio crab. Noting that the Bering Sea Women's shelter owns 25 percent of the vessel and its captains own the remaining 25 percent, Garnie asked Eckels who manages the vessel and pays for its taxes, wages, fuel and upkeep.

Eckels said Siu is the managing member of the Aleutian No. 1 LLC for operational and administrative issues. "Siu has contracted with one of the fishing captains to manage fishing operations," he added.

The vessel broke even on brown crab in 2009, Eckels reported. The exvessel price for brown crab dropped from about $3.50 per pound in 2008 to $2.31 in December 2009.

Noting that the Aleutian No. 1 harvests a lot of crab owned by NSEDC, Harrelson asked what the vessel pays the parent company as a royalty.

CDQ Harvest Manager Jon Zuck said royalty payments were a little more than $1 per pound for a total of about $560,000. Harrelson noted that royalty payments are tax-free.

The Aleutian No. 1 currently is harvesting opilio crab, Eckels noted. He said the captains have reported low catch rates and icing conditions, but they expect to harvest the quota by the end of the season in April. He said the exvessel price for opilio is about 40 cents per pound lower than last year.

NSEDC's net worth grows

NSEDC posted an $11.1 million gain in net assets in 2009, $9.6 million of it due to stock market gains, reported Controller Rick Walicki. He said the company withdrew $1 million from a securities investment portfolio for operating expenses last September. Net assets totaled $134.7 million on Dec. 31, 2009 compared to $123.6 million at the end of 2008. Walicki said his figures for 2009 are preliminary.

Bulk fuel order leaps

The NSEDC executive committee reviewed interest rate bids from three financial institutions for a line of credit the company needs to accommodate a 4-million gallon fuel order from Bonanza Fuel of Nome, a new participant in the 2010 Bulk Fuel Program. At a cost of $2 to $3 per gallon, the Bonanza Fuel order will total up to $12 million, so NSEDC will need a line of credit to meet cash flow demands, explained Chief Executive Officer Janis Ivanoff.

The program funds bulk fuel orders for participants in NSEDC's 15 member communities. They repay NSEDC for the fuel loans in monthly installments for a year. The program charges no interest or administrative fees.

The Bank of America submitted the lowest interest rate (1 percent), followed by Wells Fargo Bank (1.73 percent) and Charles Schwab (2.75 percent). Terms varied among the three entities. Walicki said Wells Fargo handles NSEDC's checking account, so it would be convenient for the company to establish a line of credit with the same bank. The committee directed staff to try to negotiate a lower interest rate with Wells Fargo.

Board and staff changes

Diomede residents elected Orville Ahkinga Jr. as their representative on the NSEDC board at a special election Dec. 16. He replaces Mary Menadelook, who resigned from the board.

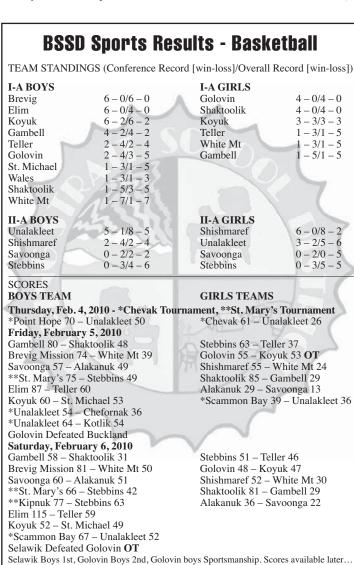

Janis Ivanoff introduced Kyan Olanna as NSEDC's general counsel, a new position approved by the board at a special meeting in December. She said Olanna is a graduate of Nome-Beltz High School and Yale University. The NSEDC board elected Jack

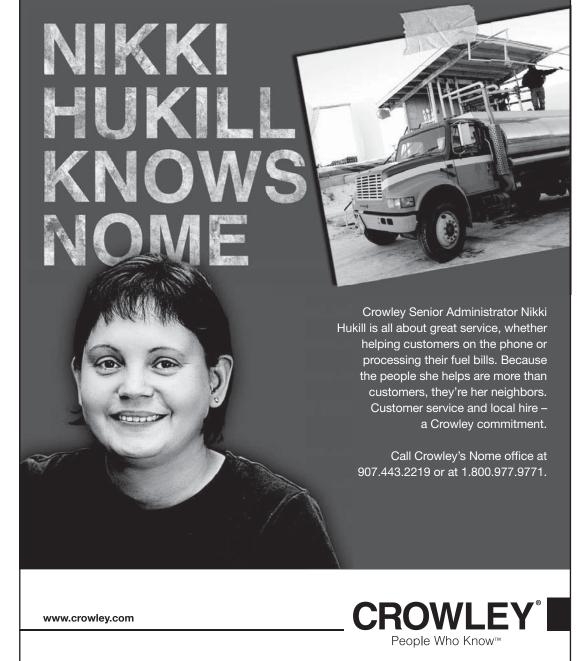

The NSEDC board elected Jack Carpenter to a seat on the Siu Alaska Corp. board at a special meeting in December. He replaces Henry Ivanoff, who was elected to the seat in November but declined it, citing plans for hip surgery.

Lady Nanooks net second in Barrow

Holding a two-point lead in hostile territory, the Lady Nanooks entered the fourth quarter against tournament host Barrow Saturday night with a tournament win within grasp.

Turned out the Lady Whalers' reach was a little longer as they outpaced Nome down the line to take the game and tournament with the 56-41 win. Richelle Horner and Hilary Stiles led Nome in the effort, each scoring 14 points. Devynn Johnson added 10 points and Renee Lammer chipped in three. Barrow was led by Jaleen Simmonds' 28 points, followed up by Hillary Lowry and Jalene Kanayurak who each had 11.

Horner, Johnson and Stiles were all named to the all-tournament team for Nome. Barrow's Simmonds was the tourney's most valuable player and three-point competition champion.

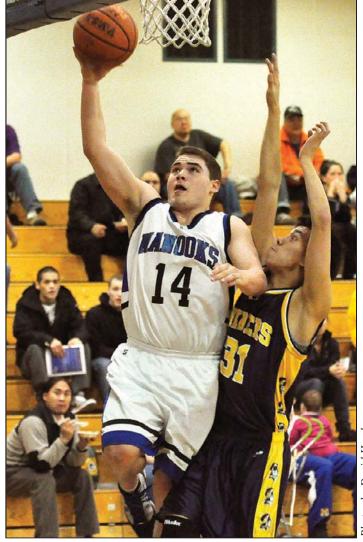

The Lady Nanooks' route to the championship game came by way of wins against Skyview on Friday and Unalaska on Thursday.

In Friday's match against Skyview, it was Nome who would play the spoiler. Down by seven at the half, the Lady Nanooks rallied on the back of Johnson's 12 points in the third and fourth quarters. The nearly six-foot tall freshman led all scorers for the game with 15 points. Stiles added a dozen points and Lammer contributed nine, including the go-ahead free-throw within the last 30 seconds of the game that sealed the lead for Nome. Casee Penrod led the Soldotna-based Panthers with 16 points.

While its final two games were nail-biters, Nome started the Barrow tournament Feb. 4 with a big 52-26 win against Unalaska. After a relatively close first quarter, the Lady Nanooks outscored the Raiders 15-5 in the second and continued to widen the lead until the final buzzer. Stiles, with a dozen points, led the scoring for Nome which saw seven players put numbers on the board. Devynn Johnson scored 10, followed by Horner with nine, Dylan Johnson with 8, Chloe Mattheis with seven, Kaitlyn Gartung with four and Lamer with two.

Nome, who comes out of the Barrow tournament with a season record of 11-7, will next head south to compete in the Valdez Elks Tournament Feb. 11-13. The Lady Nanooks will first face Glennallen on Thursday.

Playing on their opponents' home court, Nome took full advantage of the opportunity to even the record against one of the only teams to beat them this season.

The Nanooks triumphed by a dozen points over tournament-host Barrow in the championship game Saturday evening before a packed house. Nome took a 15-point lead into halftime and was able to keep the intensity up through the second half to come out on top 66-54. Barrow beat Nome 66-57 earlier in the season.

Tournament MVP Jeremy Head notched 24 points on the way to the win, backed up by Mason Evans who poured in 18. Evans, who also won the tournament's free-throw contest, recorded his 400th career assist in the game. Tim Sullivan also pitched in with a double-digit effort in the championship game, adding 13 to Nome's total. Sullivan also won the tourney's three-point contest. Joining MVP Head, Sullivan and Evans were named to spots on the all-tournament team.

Barrow was led by all-tourney team members Albert Gerke with 19 and Tyler Adams who scored 12.

In the two games that led up to the championship, Nome's opponents had to be left wondering what happened to them. On Friday Nome put 72 points between itself and Skyview in a 91-19 rout. The Nanooks came out of the first quarter with a 36-0 lead and never looked back. Nearly every Nome player had a chance to score as 10 players recorded points. Head led the way with 29, followed by Sullivan and Evans with nine, Derek Wieler, Nathan Blandford and Jode Babcock with eight, Mikey and Jon Wongittilin with six, and Jeremiah Johnson and David Stickel with four.

The Nanooks' match against Unalaska Feb. 4 got Nome's scoring machine rolling with an 80-point effort against the Raiders' 38. Sullivan led the charge for Nome with a game-high 28 points, including seven three-pointers. Evans added 17 while racking up six assists. Unalaska's Michael Fernandez led the Raiders with 10.

Nome came home from the Barrow tourney with a 16-2 record which it will defend this week at the Valdez Elks Tournament. The Nanooks will first meet Glennallen in Valdez Feb. 11.

Front Street emptying as state eyes land on 6th

By Sandra L. Medearis

A representative from the state transportation and public facilities office launched the idea Feb. 9 that the new state building could reasonably go into the Alaska Gold Co. land at the north end of Steadman.

The work session collected discussion from the public and Nome Planning Commission about replacing the current state building on Front Street.

Department of Transportation Engineer Matt DeSalernos said the site would accommodate a building large enough to house all the agencies that want into it at an estimated cost of $40 million. A building of 60,000 square feet, the size needed, would fit on the old Alaska Gold site.

This makes sense from an operations standpoint," DeSalernos said. The site would require the City to vacate Sixth Avenue and lengthen Spokane Street."

That balloon wafted over members of the public and planning commissioners like so much lead.

Continuing to gut Front Street and making a traffic jam at the end of Sixth Avenue are not good ideas, folks said. The National Guard Armory is on its way out from Front Street, too.

Maybe the existing state building could be fixed? Not likely, De Salernos said.

"I have no money to work on an old building, but I have money for a new building design and money to get another site," he said.

To address problems with the old building, everyone would have to vacate—including state Department

Council approves funds for rescue boat

NSEDC to provide more than half of the funding for vessel to be used for rescues, oil spill response

By Laurie McNicholas

The Nome Common council approved an $87,500 addition to the FY2010 Port of Nome budget for a search and rescue/oil spill response vessel at a noon meeting Feb. 11.

The funds will supplement a grant of $102,000 from Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. to buy and ship the vessel to Nome for a total cost of $189,500, according to City Manager Josie Bahnke.

Munson Boats will design and construct the vessel under an agreement with the port, Bahnke told The Nome Nugget in an e-mail following the meeting. She said the new vessel is scheduled to arrive this summer. The city asked NSEDC to help fund the vessel because the port commission made it as a top priority for capital projects fund budget by $683 to a gin will fund the 2010 capital improvements

FY2010, she added. An ordinance amending the port's budget was among five FY2010 city budget ordinances approved by the council at last week's meeting following a public hearing for each ordinance during which no public comments were presented. The amended ordinances increase the FY2010 general fund budget by $111,361 to a total of $10.3 million; decrease the capital projects fund budget by $1.2 million to a total of $8.5 million; increase the special revenue fund budget by $204,907 to a total of $483,229; increase the Port of Nome fund budget by $166,000 to a total of $4.8 million; and increase the construction total of $2.96 million.

Utility and port matters

The council heard first readings of proposed ordinances to approve the FY2010 operations and maintenance budget of Nome Joint Utility System and to replace all of the Port of Nome's existing tariffs with Tariff No. 7. The proposed ordinances are scheduled for second reading, a public hearing and final action at the next regular council meeting.

The proposed NJUS budget includes $13.5 million in estimated revenues and $12.8 million for operations and maintenance expense, with a net operating margin of $717,759. The net mar-budget, annual bond and debt service principal payments, fuel inventory and grant program local participation. These items are not included in the operations and maintenance budget.

Under Tariff No. 7 dockage rates for homeported vessels dry-docked within the Port of Nome for the winter season (November through May) would increase from $500 to $700, and vessels that remain idle throughout the summer (June through October) would pay a flat rate of $400 for the season. Vessels permitted to freeze in at the water line within the small boat harbor during winter months would pay a flat rate of Rock Creek to stay on back burner

By Tyler Rhodes

Among the figures and reports in NovaGold's recently released yearend report for 2009 is a call to speed up the potential restart of a stalled mining project.

The company notes plans are in the works for a more optimized design for the mining project that was halted a couple Novembers ago. That new plan features an accelerated construction schedule with an eye toward taking advantage of a stronger metals market.

Sounds a lot like the Rock Creek gold mine just north of Nome.

But it's not.

In the Feb. 11 release, Rock Creek owner NovaGold highlights its plans to put the Galore Creek Mine in British Columbia back on track. As for Rock Creek in Nome, it appears that mine will remain in the indefinite study period in which it has been since it was put on the shelf in November 2008. "The Company is completing a detailed review process to evaluate start-up requirements for the Rock Creek project, but does not currently plan to initiate start-up activities in 2010," reads a Feb. 11 No-

vaGold press release. A more clear picture of Rock Creek's future, however, may arrive later this year. Like many in Nome, the state wants to know what is to become of the site just outside of town. NovaGold reports that it received re-

Dear Editor,

As a mother of children currently in the public school system, I would like to encourage the School Board to listen to the people and make their decisions based on what the majority of people/parents want. I could quote statistics, stories, by-laws, etc. it's just not needed...the Board is supposed to be the voice of their constituents...I think our voice is loud and clear.

Thank you, Marcy Merrill Nome, AK

Dear Editor: Open letter to the Nome School Board:

I have attended the last two Nome School board meetings, participated in the process, and heard others participate through the hearing of delegations. An overwhelming majority of the speakers outlined the many positive outcomes created by the team of Sullivan and Boyer. I have read the annual reviews by Superintendent Wehde, of both Janeen Sullivan and Doug Boyer, both of which were very specific and glowing. I have even repeatedly gone to the Facebook page known as "I do not support Sullivan" and see no reason there to have my mind changed.

I also participated in the Pledge of Allegiance at the beginning of each of the school board meetings. For your reading pleasure, I have included a definition of "pledge." It is as follows: a solemn oath of allegiance or fidelity to the United States. To me, this means not only to the United States but also the principles for which we stand. I will write out the pledge of allegiance here for anyone that needs a reminder. This is not merely rote words we say as Americans to get the meeting started: "I pledge allegiance to the flag of the United States of America, and to the republic for which it stands, one nation, under God, with liberty and JUSTICE for

I would also like to include a definition of justice: "The upholding of what is just, especially fair treatment and due reward in accordance with honor, standards, or law." So, unless any one or all of you on the Nome School Board can give Mrs. Sullivan and Mr. Boyer a reason why their contracts were not renewed, despite all the evidence that they should have, then you have acted in an unjust way and therefore an un-American way.

I know that some of you insist it is OK to hide behind the executive session; however, the executive session is to provide for the privacy of the personnel involved, not the Board.

Board privacy flies in the face of OPEN and honest meetings. It is apparent to me from the board action (inaction) at the meetings I attended, as well as the radio interview by Ms. Payenna, that this issue was a foregone conclusion long before the January 12 meeting. This is injustice at

Shamefully Irresponsible

It's not merely cabin fever-crazy; it's just unexplainably absurd. Not surprisingly the Nome School Board did not change its mind and refused to consider rehiring the Nome-Beltz principals. In light of overwhelming community testimony in favor of the principals, the board remained deaf, didn't budge and continued to give no reason for their decision. The public deserves a reason. The principals deserve a reason. There was no due process.

The horrible fallout from this situation is the negative impact it has on the community and our school system. It is not good. It has encouraged wild speculation, generated cruel gossip and ugly rumor. Everyone who has had a perceived problem for the past several years has made their issues public. Parents and children upset about everything from not doing homework to being expelled for disruptive behavior are piling onto the mess. Relatives of kids who didn't get to play enough basketball are in the argument. Parents who don't like the coaches are talked about. Folks can't help but wonder. Some say it is due to budget cuts, others just repeat tales and the telling gets worse. Is it due to racial conflict? Wounded pride? Girlish gossip? Bitterness? Or is it really over basketball? Why would professional educators and administrators want to work for a school board that is so shallow and petty? They demonstrate a vindictiveness to try to get rid of any teacher who does not kiss up to them. The board is like something out of Alice in Wonderland with too many Red Queens shouting, "Off with their heads!"

The present school board should be replaced. They are mean spirited and are singularly lacking in wisdom. They have blown off board training. However, the damage is already done. They think they have a mandate because they were elected in a democratic process, they think they are practicing democracy. Hopefully our teachers and administrators will bear with us while the community puts democracy to the test and replaces the current board with folks who demonstrate maturity, common sense and have the wisdom to inspire public confidence and let our administrators go about the task of providing a safe and productive learning environment. - N.L.M.-

Foster's Juneau Report

By Rep. Neal Foster

Greetings from Juneau! Coming into a Legislature that has been organized for a year does present its challenges for a freshman legislator. Everyone else is organized and ready to pick up with where things were left at the end of the first regular session of the 26th Legislature. Fortunately things are coming together quickly with the help of my staff and the goodwill of other legislators. A familiar Nome face, Paul LaBolle, agreed to come to Juneau with me and will be my chief-of-staff during the session.

I am happy to be on the House Finance Committee and find that the demands are substantial. My main focus will be to continue to minimize any cuts to program that affect our region and the rest of Rural Alaska, and to seek funding that brings in needed infrastructure to our communities. We still have water and sewer needs, school construction and repair, airport and road construction. housing, health facilities, community buildings, heavy equipment and a host of other serious needs

In the area of legislation I consider it part of my responsibility to evaluate legislation and support things that are of benefit to our region and to block or change bills that would work to the determent of our rural communities. I am co-prime-sponsor on HB 278 Energy Efficient Home Grant Fund. The potential impact of the Bill on our region deals with the Energy Rebate Program. There are currently two Energy Efficiency programs running: the Weatherization program for low income and the Energy Rebate program for everyone else. The Weatherization program is free to qualified applicants and is run through the Regional Housing Authority. The Energy Rebate program, run through Alaska Housing Finance Corporation, reimburses people for work they do that improves the energy efficiency of their homes. The problem with this last program is that many of these people, while they're income is too high to qualify for the Weatherization program, do not have enough disposable income to pay the upfront costs for the home improvements.

HB 278 would create a voucher program that would allow contractors and vendors to do the work and provide materials based on a promise to pay by the State. Additionally I've been in contact with AHFC to see what can be done to improve rural participation in the Energy Rebate program. Currently AHFC will pay for the travel of an energy rater if there are at least three applicants in the community. AHFC is also in discussions about allowing energy assessors, who work for the housing authorities, to perform ratings under this program while they are in the field doing similar work under the Weatherization program.

We are in a positive situation in that oil prices have been higher than projected and thus we are potentially looking at a significant surplus, about $2.1 billion. The governor has made two of his priorities — pay back the balance owed to the Constitutional Budget Reserve account ($400 Million) and forward fund the state's school districts ($1.1 billion). The governor's supplemental request ($326.5 million) is being used to cover unexpected costs and pay for projects that the governor views as time sensitive. In round numbers that leaves about $270 million as our FY 10 surplus. The FY 11 surplus is forecasted to be $330 million. So the grand total for the legislature to work with (after the governor's request is about $600 million. However, one of the governor's major priorities is the Merit Based Scholarship fund, which will cost $400 million to capitalize, leaving only $200 million of the total surplus. At this time the amount of money that might be available to fund requested community grants is still unknown and probably will not be finalized until later in the Capital Budget cycle. The legislature has several options to address spending. I would be happy to hear from the people back home about their ideas and priorities. We hope to close out the Operating Budget in early March and finalize the Capital Budget before the session ends in mid-April.

Energy is one area where we expect to see some important legislation this session. We expect to see legislation that will address the rising energy costs faced by all of Alaska and particularly by small isolated communities. During the interim, hearings were held in several communities across the state and a significant amount of information and a great range of ideas have been explored and should be reflected in the resulting bills.

I am pleased to be in the legislature and proud to follow in the footsteps of my father and grandfather. I am here to serve you and I expect to work hard to meet the needs of House District 39. I would like to hear from you regarding issues you might face as a constituent.

Please feel free to contact me or my staff if you have any questions or need any help. The session number is (800) 478-3789. If you are out of the district the number is (907) 465-3789. I can also be reached by email at Representative_Neal_Foster@ legis.state.ak.us.

Gang member sentenced by Nome judge

A member of Anchorage's Crips gang has been sentenced to 12 years in prison for his role in distributing crack cocaine in Kotzebue. Last Thursday, Nome Superior Court Judge Ben Esch imposed the sentence on Hakim Giddins, 29, an Anchorage resident and a fugitive parolee from California. The case began in November 2007 in Kotzebue, when police seized about 72 grams of crack cocaine and arrested Giddins and two Kotzebue residents on drug charges.

Charges against Giddins were dismissed, but after resolving the cases against his co-defendants, the state re-indicted him in November 2008 for misconduct involving a controlled substance and conspiracy to commit misconduct. Giddins was convicted by a Kotzebue jury after a trial in August 2009. At his sentencing hearing last Thursday, an Anchorage police officer testified to Giddins' gang membership.

Judge Esch pronounced Giddins dangerous and in need of isolation to protect the community. He noted that Giddins had two prior felony convictions, one for witness tampering in Anchorage, and another for transporting drugs and conspiracy in California, and that he had been adjudicated a delinquent for a manslaughter case while a juvenile. In the past 14 years, Giddins has been in jail or on probation for all but six weeks.

Hans Gatt wins Yukon Quest

After years of playing second fiddle, musher Hans Gatt of Canada is the new champion of the Yukon Quest sled dog race. Gatt staged a victory coming from behind and broke last year's record by 23 hours, finishing the 1,000-mile race from Fairbanks to Whitehorse in nine days and 26 minutes. Gatt arrived with

House resolution calls to expedite ANCSA and state land conveyances

Despite the 2004 federal law that was passed to complete transfer of state and Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act land entitlements by 2009, millions of acres are still not yet transferred. As of December 31, 2008, over 66 million acres of land still awaits patent in Alaska, including more than 40 million acres of land that have been tentatively approved to the State and 14 million acres conveyed tentatively to ANCSA corporations, and over 12 million additional acres await conveyance.

Alaska legislators feel that the Bureau of Land Management needs more money to speed up surveys necessary before the land transfers, and the house resolution asks the United States Congress to budget sufficient funds to BLM to ensure the timely completion of land surveys in Alaska in order that land promised to Alaska Natives and the State of Alaska can be patented.

AFN supports House energy omnibus bill

Last week, leaders of the Alaska Federation of Natives threw their support behind the House Special Committee on Energy's 2010 Omnibus Energy Legislation. AFN president Julie Kitka and other AFN leaders testified to the committee last week to express the organization's support for the comprehensive energy bill.

"Rural Alaska is ready and waiting for inclusive energy legislation that can make rural communities remain sustainable," said energy co-chair Bryce Edgmon, D-Dillingham. House Bill 305 sweeps together nine energy related bills introduced last year. The bills came from both the house and senate and cover alternative energy, the creation of a new state department of energy, energy technology and design standards for rural schools.

Denali Commission faces funding cuts

The Obama administration has announced plans to weed out earmarks bound to Alaska, but the new head of the Denali Commission is prepared to fight the proposed budget cuts to the tune of $10 million. President Obama proposed to cut $10 million from the Commission's health care facilities construction program. The Denali Commission's federal co-chair Joel Neimeyer says plans for this year include renovating a clinic in Wales, among others. Neimeyer said in an APRN interview that the Commission would be able to usher a number of projects through their pre-construction phases, and help them become attractive to other investors, like federal agencies, the state, or private companies. In recent years the Commission's overall federal funds have dwindled. It reached its peak in 2006 with about $141 million and was down to $61 of Fish and Game and the Legislative Information Office - and renovators would have to take the building back to the frame that is corroding on the ocean side. The old building received damage from the storms of 1974, 2003 and 2004.

No approval or disapproval of a building site can happen until the Department of Transportation and Public Facilities files a preliminary plat with the city. Money for the project still has to go through the legislative process.

DeSalernos said he is trying to find a site to accommodate growth and all the potential tenants—district attorney, public defenders, Alaska State Troopers, adult probation and the like, with security and ease of use.

"Front Street is already pretty dead. I would hate to see the heart of our community gone," said shop owner and Nome Common Council Member Mary Knodel. "I think it is very important to keep Front Street alive."

Knodel suggested that the state could tear down the old building and combine that space with the existing old parking lot to keep the same site.

Nah, not good, planning commissioner Jeff Darling offered.

'Common sense tells me building near the ocean is not what to do," he said.

DeSalernos said building by the ocean was a dead idea in his department.

"Internally, the idea of building by the ocean side would be like pushing a rope uphill," he said.

Hear, hear, said Larry Smithheisler of DOT. The existing building is a step away from condemnation.

'It's a tough spot to be in. I understand you want to keep it [on Front Street], but it's not a friendly place for a building," Smithheisler said. "I think another flood will cave in that [seaside] wall."

Knodel said a lot next to the Pioneer Hall-on Front Street-was available. Janice Doherty, president of Nanuq Inc., echoed Knodel's concern about killing Front Street and said that the large vacant lot owned by Sitnasuak Native Corp., across from the museum and west of the Old Federal Building was available.

Too small—the proposed project would not fit these sites, according to DeSalernos. The building needs to be larger than any available space on Front Street

Mitch Erickson of Nome Chamber of Commerce said that Nome could end up like Kotzebue-all spread out with facilities not within walking distance of downtown Nome.

DeSalernos cautioned that a site needs to be found—now—as the planets, personnel in DOT and legislative atmosphere are lined up to get a new state building for Nome.

"There is lots of interest in DOT to replace the building now," he said. This may be a one-time shot.'

Nikolai Ivanoff of Alaska Gold liked the plan. He would like to see an Alaska Gold and mining museum near the office building.

The Planning Commission would wait for the state to file a preliminary plat and then take up the issue, commissioners said.

In other business, planners discussed a work plan with newly hired professional planner Eileen Bechtol.

Bechtol, of Bechtol Planning and Development based in Homer, signed a five-month contract with the city last month to provide planning services with a $20,000 lid on an hourly fee of $60, and $175 per day when she works in Nome, plus some expenses.

Bechtol will help the planners update the city's comprehensive plan, do some grant writing, and tweak the subdivision code, plus other issues needed by the City.

Specifically, Bechtol and commissioners spoke of boiling down, with subheadings, the activities permitted in the Resource (mining minerals, sand and gravel) Development Zone.

And, Bechtol suggested, the commissioners might want to think about annexation of outlying areas.

"This might be a good forum to hear public feeling. You don't have to advocate it," she said. The planning commissioners could go to chamber, go to Rotary, shop it around for public input, be a lead body to facilitate consideration as part of the comprehensive plan.

Planning panel chair Irene Anderson has resigned to pursue retirement activities; Tom Sparks took her seat at the head of the table. The commission also elected Charlie Weiss as vice chair: Jimmy Adams continued for another term as secretary.

"I will try to do my best to keep our meetings shorter," Sparks said. "I see some things we discuss that aren't our purview. I'd like to stop that.'

As a final item, Jeff Darling said the group should identify streets that are on the map, already platted, but not filled, so that builders in the future would have this information and advantage. In the past, some property owners have been troubled by drainage issues and puddling in moldy yards.

$1,500 per vessel for the winter and $1,000 for the summer if the vessel remains without interruption at its assigned location. Owners of these vessels would be required to sign a release of liability form with the Port of Nome.

Tariff No. 7 calls for increases in wharfage rates for certain types of cargo, and it raises fees for amenities such as line handling for ships over 300 feet, dump truck service for unregulated refuse for ships over 300 feet, potable water and security for cruise ships. Penalties for violations of any provisions of the tariff or rules and regulations of the Port of Nome also would increase.

The proposed new tariff includes changes in facility security and access to the port. "... As of February 12, 2009, all personnel needing access to restricted or secure areas within the facility during regulated operations will be required to present their Transportation Worker's Identification Credentials (TWIC) and have a valid reason for entry," the tariff reads. "Cargo and fuel shore-side operators will operate under the Port's Security Plan and be responsible for controlling access to the restricted and secure areas during their respective operations. Regulated cargo and fuel vessels will maintain security watch whenever remaining dockside without actively conducting any cargo operations. The Port of Nome will provide access control to these areas during all passenger vessel operations."

Back taxes sought

The council adopted a resolution authorizing the city attorney upon request from the city manager to commence legal action against Steven Longley d/b/a E-Z Enterprises to collect sales tax, penalty and interest owing to the city and to require Longley to obtain a 2010 sales tax license using any available remedy including seeking a court order prohibiting Longley from continuing to make sales in Nome.

The resolution says the city clerk estimates Longley owes more than $16,000 in delinquent tax, penalty and interest, and that he has failed to submit sales tax returns since about February 2008.

The council approved a motion by Jon Larson to insert the clause "upon request of the city manager" in the resolution after Bahnke reported she has met with Longley to discuss possible terms for payment of his back taxes.

Utility manager's report

NJUS Manager John Handeland reports that he took John Stromberg, the Alaska Energy Authority's assistant project manager for wind, to see the wind turbines at Banner Peak and to the site of Nome's future wind energy project on Newton Peak Feb. 9. They discussed a $4 million grant for wind turbines that NJUS was awarded from the state Renewable Energy Fund, Handeland added.

NJUS applied for a $15 million grant from the Renewable Energy Fund, but awards were capped at $4 million, Handeland explained in an e-mail to the Nugget. "Our original request was for five 600-kilowatt units, so [the] funding will get us one," he wrote. "We'll continue to look for other funding sources, as there are efficiencies to be achieved by doing multiples.'

Handeland told the council that NJUS has received a $265,000 grant from the Denali Commission to assist with communication and control integration upgrades for the Banner Peak system.

Larson asked how the Banner Peak system is performing. Handeland said 15 of the 18 wind turbines are functional, and some days when there is wind the system produces 7,000 to 8,000 kilowatts. "We've had a total of 80,000 to 100,000 kilowatts in from them in the last couple of months," he said. "We hope they ramp up to 2 million kilowatts a year.

Line crews have begun to clean up wiring from communications cables left on Front Street by television crews, Handeland said. He wants the public to know there may be occasions when cable is hanging down toward the street during the cleanup process.

City manager's report

Bahnke said an official from the Alaska Department of Transportation and Public Facilities discussed an acquisition plan for property owned by the Alaska Gold Co. between Steadman and Spokane on Sixth Street to construct a new state office building at a meeting on Feb. 9. Council members Jerald Brown and Mary Knodel attended the meeting.

The DOT/PF official said the city needs to make a decision about the acquisition plan, Knodel reported. "They are not going to buy it unless we vacate it," she added. She said lots are available on Front Street for a new state office building, or the DOT/PF could construct a new building on the parking lot next to the existing state office building on Front Street and then demolish the old building and use its site for a parking lot.

Larson said it would pretty much destroy downtown Nome to move all state offices to the Sixth Street property. Knodel said the city's comprehensive plan calls for revitalization of Front Street and she wants to see some state offices stay there.

In an e-mail to the Nugget following the council meeting, Bahnke said the DOT/PF wants the council to provide input on preferences for relocating state offices in Nome. Noting that the Nome Planning Commission has authority to approve major subdivisions, she said the process begins with submission of a formal application and preliminary plat to the commission by Alaska Gold and the DOT/PF.

'The Commission holds a public hearing and approves, approves with conditions or disapproves the preliminary plat," Bahnke wrote. "If it is approved, the subdivider (Alaska Gold) submits a final plat with compliance of all conditions of the preliminary plat. Once again, the Planning Commission approves, approves with conditions or disapproves the final [plat].'

In other business, Bahnke suggested the council schedule a work session to tour the bowling alley at the Recreation Center to assess options for refurbishing, equipping and reopening the facility. She said a more accurate budget for the proposed project has been developed by Chip Leeper, Recreation Center director, and Dana Handeland, the city's payroll technician.

Foster Building funding

Mayor Denise Michels expressed gratitude to Rep. Reggie Joule of Kotzebue for preparing to introduce a request in the Alaska House of Representatives for funding to construct the Richard Foster Building in Nome. The facility would house collections of the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum, and it is the city's top legislative priority. Richard Foster represented District 39 in the House of Representatives for nearly 21 years prior to his death in 2009.

Executive session

The council met in an executive session closed to the public immediately following the regular meeting to discuss Moonlight Springs property disputes and a topic involving the Snake River Bridge and the DOT/PF. All council members except Randy Pomeranz attended the meeting.

Pilgrim Hot Springs to be auctioned off March 5

By Diana Haecker

On March 5, the fate of Pilgrim Hot Springs will be determined when the U.S. Bankruptcy Court plans to auction off the 300-acre property approximately 60 miles north of Nome.

The Catholic Bishop of Northern Alaska has owned Pilgrim Hot Springs since 1917, but when faced with nearly 200 civil claims of clergy sexual abuse against Catholic priests or lay workers—and demands for payments to the victims—CBNA declared bankruptcy in 2008.

After two years of bankruptcy proceedings and two failed reorganization plans, the victims, the court and CBNA agreed on a consensual plan. Included in that plan is the sale of Pilgrim to the highest bidder. In the plan, $9.8 million will go to claimants. Most of those funds come from the sale of diocesan property, including the hot springs.

For many Nome residents, the land holds memories of the fragrance of the cottonwoods, time spent there with family and a rejuvenating bath in the hot springs. Others are after it for its geothermal potential. Scientists, engineers and entrepreneurs are interested in the land as energy security arose to the forefront with the volatility of fossil fuel prices.

The University of Alaska Fairbanks is currently conducting a federally funded study to evaluate the sources and extent of the hot springs. The site also holds agricultural possibilities of producing hothouse fruits and vegetables. The auction is expected to garner bids of close to $2 million. Tom Buzek, CBNA's business administrator, told The Nome Nugget Feb. 15 that qualifying bids are due by Feb. 25 and bidders must post $250,000 in earnest money.

Buzek said that CBNA has to make sure that the bidders qualify. He added that the bankruptcy court in Anchorage will run the auction.

After Pilgrim Hot Springs was deeded to the Catholic Church in 1917, the church founded a boarding school and orphanage to give a home to children whose parents were killed by the great influenza pandemic in 1918. The orphanage closed in the 1940s. The site has been registered on the National Historic Registry since 1977.

HOT SPOT—The tub at Pilgrim Hot Springs is surrounded by snow Feb. 13. While the temperature outside the tub was in the single digits, the water was well above 100°F.

newed approval Dec. 31 to continue the operation of its tailings dam from the Alaska Department of Resources. While the approved certificate is set to expire in November 2011, it contains a stipulation that the mining firm notify the state by this November of its intentions for the property.

Construction of the mine facilities was 90 percent complete when NovaGold suffered the dual blow of financial troubles and mechanical complications at Rock Creek in 2008. Since the mine was idled, NovaGold has concentrated its efforts at the site on meeting environmental requirements outlined in its various permits. Most of that work has revolved around water, whether it was managing the flow of storm-water at the site or reducing the liquid buildup behind the dam at the mine's tailings facility.

Water woes have figured large for the mine, resulting in state and federal enforcement actions. The Feb. 11 release notes that NovaGold is updating its storm water pollution prevention plan to satisfy federal Environmental Protection Agency requests. NovaGold also said its new certification for the dam terminates a notice of violation from the state that had stood since December 2008. "NovaGold worked diligently in 2009 to improve the project's water management structures and action plan to ensure the project remains in compliance with all environmental regulations during the spring freshet, with the objective that the project have no reportable environmental incidents in 2010," the release reads.

NovaGold reported spending $27.7 million at Rock Creek over 2009. The 2010 budget for Rock Creek is approximately $17 million.

Aside from both being stopped before they could go into production, the Rock Creek and Galore Creek projects contrast in several departments. In terms of scale, Galore would be much larger than the Nome mine. NovaGold estimates the potential mine holds at least 8.9 billion pounds of copper, 7.3 million ounces of gold and 123 ounces of silver. Rock Creek is estimated to contain at least a half million ounces of gold.

Galore Creek is also a joint effort. NovaGold is in a 50-50 joint venture with Teck, a major mining firm that counts the Red Dog zinc mine in Northwest Alaska among the properties it operates. Teck was also involved in the Pogo gold mine in the Interior before selling out its share in mid 2009. Under the ownership agreement, Teck is paying all costs for the project until it reaches its buyin obligations to gain 50 percent control. NovaGold reports Teck still has $25 million to pay in that pursuit. In contrast, NovaGold is solely responsible for costs at Rock Creek.

A year before Rock Creek ground to a halt, NovaGold and Teck announced it would stop work at Galore Creek. The closure came after a study of the project showed construction would likely take much longer than earlier anticipated and would come at a much higher cost. The timing of the study and its release became the base for a shareholder class-action lawsuits. Portions of some of the suits were tossed out of court while others were just settled this week (see related story on this page).

While Rock Creek benefits from its proximity to Nome for a power supply and other in-place infrastructure, Galore Creek's location is more remote. In 2009, NovaGold reported reaching the approximate halfway point of a 56-mile access road. While power supply has also been an issue for the project, Galore Creek received good news when the Canadian federal government announced plans to support the construction of an electrical transmission line in the region.

Elevated copper prices also make Galore more attractive. Even with these encouraging factors, NovaGold does not say that the restart of Galore Creek is a given. "Given the continued strength of the copper market, [Galore Creek Mining Corp.], is considering a more aggressive program in 2010 to advance the project toward a construction decision," the Feb. 11 release reads. The company notes that it should release an updated mine plan by the second quarter this year and that a pre-feasibility study that will layout updated capital and operating cost estimates should be completed by mid 2011.

Overall for 2009, NovaGold reported Feb. 11 that it lost $74.3 million Canadian compared with a loss of $195 million Canadian for 2008.

The company reported that it swallowed what it calls an "asset impairment charge" of $160.9 million Canadian in 2008 offset by $47.3 million Canadian through the sale of assets and the recovery $36.1 million Canadian due to its suspended projects. NovaGold said there were no comparable material amounts in these areas for 2009.

Favorable exchange rates in 2009 allowed for a $15.2 million Canadian gain compared to a $28.7 million Canadian loss the year before. The costs of maintaining NovaGold's idled properties grew in 2009 compared to 2008, since in 2009 Galore was joined by Rock Creek in maintenance mode. However, the costs related to exploration were slashed from $49.6 million Canadian in 2008 to $17.9 million in 2009, largely due to the two idled mines.

NovaGold reported 2009 income of $1.2 million Canadian mostly through land and gravel sales, and gold royalties compared to $2.2 million Canadian in 2008. The company attributed the reduction to reduced land sale activity in Nome.

Looking at 2010, NovaGold reports holding cash equivalents of $38.2 million and working capital of $26.6 million Canadian. The main costs it anticipates for 2010 are $14 million to be put toward the massive Donlin Creek project located near the Kuskokwim River and the $17 million for Rock Creek.

NovaGold is pursuing the Donlin Creek project in an equal partnership with major mining corporation Barrick Gold. The 2010 budget for Donlin Creek is aimed at optimization studies, which include studying the potential for using natural gas to power the project. In its Feb. 11 report, NovaGold said by mid-2010 it aims to either file permit applications with the state under the original project design or, with the joint venture board's approval, revise the feasibility study to include an option for natural gas. The latter option would require a supplemental budget.

NovaGold estimates it will need financing within a year to meet its ongoing requirements for Donlin Creek, Rock Creek, and general and administrative costs. The company said it expects to need significant financing in the coming years to meet its share of development costs for Donlin Creek and Galore Creek. With no producing mines, NovaGold is primarily dependant on financing to support its initiatives.

Lawsuits over Galore Creek settled

Mining firm NovaGold Resources announced Feb. 16 that it has entered into an agreement to settle a number of class-action lawsuits filed in the United States and Canada over its handling of the Galore Creek project in British Columbia.

NovaGold also owns Alaska Gold, the owner and operator of the Rock Creek Mine near Nome.

According to Lebaton Sucharow LLP, the law firm that represented shareholders in U.S. filings, the settlement calls for a payout of $28 million Canadian. "This settlement resolves the claims of all of NovaGold's shareholders who purchased shares on the American Stock Exchange and Toronto Stock Exchange, pending approval of the U.S. Federal Court for the Southern District of New York and the Canadian courts presiding over class actions pending in that country," reads a Feb. 16 press release from Labaton Sucharow.

The three suits, filed Dec. 22, 2008, Oct. 14, 2009 and Oct. 28, 2009, allege NovaGold misled investors as to the true cost and feasibility of developing the project. The suits claimed that NovaGold knew the costs were more than double what it was reporting to shareholders.

Despite the agreement, NovaGold maintains it did nothing wrong. "We are pleased to have settled these proceedings," NovaGold Chief Executive Officer and President Rick Van Nieuwenhuyse said in a press release. "While we believe we ultimately would have been successful in defending the allegations, this settlement allows us to focus 100 percent of our attention on executing our business plan..."

NovaGold further said the settlement should be covered by its insurance. "The Company does not anticipate having to pay out any of its cash under the terms of the settlement," the NovaGold press release reads.

A follow-up story contributed by Laura Samuelson from the Archives of the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum

A letter penned by Jafet Lindeberg describing the discovery of gold at Anvil Creek appeared in the December 24, 2009 edition of The Nome Nugget Newspaper. The original letter caught the eye of a certified graphologist, also known as a handwriting analyst. Albert Selenke of Denver, Colorado, analyzed the handwriting of Jafet Lindeberg. The results are fascinating. As Mr. Selenke requested in his letter to the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum, a sample of Jafet Lindeberg's autograph is published with this story.

According to the Web article "Your Handwriting: What Does it Tell About You" by Gary Thomas, "Handwriting analysis is the science involved in producing a personality profile of the writer by examining the characteristics, traits and strokes of an individual's handwriting. Besides creating a complete personality profile, many other things are revealed in someone's handwriting, such as health issues, morality, past experiences, hidden talents, mental problems – to name just a few.

"Your brain guides your hand.

"Your brain guides your hand. Everything put on paper is a result of a two-way circuit between your brain and the motor reflex muscles of your hand. Thus, your handwriting becomes a polygraph or oscilloscope read-out of your "complete self." To you, it's just handwriting, but to a handwriting analyst, it paints a picture of the person "behind the pen.""

Alaska gets regional climate center

The federal National Ocean and Atmospheric Administration is planning to create a NOAA climate service office to address the tide of climate change related problems across the nation. The new office is meant to bring science and climate change solutions together under one roof. Last week, U.S. Commerce Secretary Gary Locke made the announcement that Alaska will be home to one of six regional climate centers to be created nationwide.

Chris Vaccaro with NOAA told The Nome Nugget that this essentially means that six regional directors will be selected. "One such director would be located in Anchorage, because each director would be co-located with the existing regional headquarters of the National Weather Service," wrote Vaccaro in an email. "But we aren't building or creating new centers.'

Secretary Locke said in a statement that the center's purpose is to provide critical planning information for communities and that the NOAA climate service will help tackle the challenges of mitigating and adapting to climate change.

NOAA is the agency responsible to manage fisheries, monitor ocean health, make weather predictions, monitor environmental health and to conduct climate science. Until now, a climate center in Reno, Nevada is serving Alaska, but is mostly conducting drought forecasting in the Southwest — something hardly relevant to Alaska. Alaska freshman Senator Mark Begich said he welcomes the news that Alaska gets its own center. "With fisheries, ocean health and climate change among some of the top issues in Alaska, this is good news as NOAA moves forward with its reorganization," Begich said. "The decision to establish Alaska as a separate region in the organization recognizes Alaska's unique climate systems and the growing understanding that climate change in the Arctic is having global consequences.

"Whether planning for village relocation sites or making decisions on new utility corridors and roads over permafrost, Alaska has a huge demand for climate information," Begich added.

NOAA administrator Dr. Jane Lubchenco said that the new NOAA climate service aims to transform science into useable climate services. In order to become more userfriendly, NOAA also created a new allow access to climate data like temperature, carbon dioxide concentration and sea level, and a climate science magazine called Climate-Watch, where scientists discuss recent climate research and findings.

Weather may have caused reindeer bust of 1966:

What harsh winters could mean for reindeer populations of Seward Peninsula

In 1944, the U.S. Coast Guard dropped off 29 reindeer on St. Matthew Island, in the middle of the Bering Sea, as a last-resort food source for their 19 men stationed there. Unknowingly, they set up a perfect boom and bust population on the lichen-covered island. Within 13 years, the 29 reindeer had turned into 1,300. The reindeer were never used as food for the men, who were only there for a short period. In another six years, biologist Dave Klein returned to the island to find the herd had increased to 6,000.

The biologist noted the lichen that once coated the small island was being decimated by the ever-increasing population. He knew a bust was imminent. In 1966, three years after his last visit, the population shriveled to 24. Only one male, with irregular antlers and thought to be unable to breed, survived.

So what happened on the island? It was apparent the herd was due for a decline, but never would one suspect such a large loss in just three years. It has been thought for years that overpopulation was the main, if not only, cause.

Klein teamed up with two climatologists, Martha Shulski and John Walsh, to recently find that harsh winter weather conditions played a role, as well. The winter of '1963-1964 was especially hard to get through. Although the nearest weather station was located about 200 miles away on St. Paul Island, there are signs that heavy snowfall and a layer of ice covered the exhausted lichen supply. There were also periods of high winds reaching 67 mph on St. Paul, while the average temperature in early February was around -11°F. The depth of snow on that island was 19 inches, with a hard-packed surface. The conditions are thought to have been similar on St. Matthew.

The Seward Peninsula is the highest reindeer-populated area in Alaska, and has been ever since the shipment of caribou's cousin to the state in 1892. Today about 14 herds or 10,000 reindeer occupy the area, managed by Alaska Native families. Annually or biannually, the owners round up their herds in corrals to harvest the animals or sample them for research. The wildlife is highly important to the region because it ties a part of historical living to the present, and acts as a red meat source for some communities. With the unpredictable weather across the globe, and the high-susceptibility of animals in our region to harsh conditions, it is possible a repeat of the St. Matthew Island disaster could occur.

The plus side is that it is a lot easier to keep track of herds during winter, according to Kawerak's Rose Fosdick. In the winter, owners can directly snowmachine to their herd fairly simply. They often do so a few times a week, just to check up on them because it's possible. With new technology, owners can place satellite collars on some reindeer, making it even easier to track them down. So while the reindeer are often affected by icy layers or deep snow, owners know what's going on, and might be able to lead them to better conditions.

Relay for Life of Nome: Kickoff for May relay

By Denise Olin

Nome kicked off the American Cancer Society's Relay for Life to a great start with food, entertainment, raffle prizes and camaraderie at the Old St. Joe's Feb. 9. This was an early start to the planned May Relay fund raiser. Its purpose was to get teams and participants in tune with their chosen theme. Volunteers, participants and survivors showed up to prepare for their upcoming relay. The team theme this year is "holidays." Teams will be such holidays as St. Patrick's Day team and Christmas team and will go with their holiday theme by preparing costumes and banners, a time for creativity.

Wes Clanton of Anchorage attended to share the history of Relay for Life and to share his story on how cancer had touched his life, while encouraging others to participate.

Linda Maack, a KNOM volunteer who also volunteers in many other areas in Nome, graciously gave reasons to participate and the w's of it all. Who, what, when, where and why were asked and answered. Who? You, as a community member, get involved to raise funds for a very good cause–cancer; it has touched everyone's life. Think back and remember who it is you know that fought the battle. Who? You, get involved in celebration on those who have survived the ultimate fight.

Who? You, get involved to remember those who lost their battle with cancer. Who? You, get involved to help family, friends and loved ones to fight back.

What? Relay for Life of Nome event. When? May 22 - 23. Where? Old St. Joe's Hall.

Nomeites demonstrated their true volunteerism colors and showed up in force for the kickoff party while community members shared their bout with cancer, their hardships through it all, their humor through it all. This is a call for community members to help raise funds and awareness for fellow community members. Come join the relay, organize a team, be creative!

According to the Relay for Life of Nome website there is $550.00 has been raised so far, organize a team, relay alone, raise money on your own, get sponsorship and increase this amount raised. Relay for Life of Nome will take place on May 22 – 23.

ON THE MOVE (above)-Nome's Tim Sullivan drives off a block by teammate Jeremy Head during Saturday's championship game against Barrow in the Valdez Elks' Tournament.

Barrow goes one up in back-and-forth battle

The Nome boys basketball team has facedand vanquished-plenty of opponents this year, but it would seem the season has come down to the Nanooks' running battle against Barrow.

The two teams met for the third time this year in Valdez over the weekend with Barrow getting a leg up on Nome in what has been a see-saw struggle between the two teams. The Nanooks stole a win from the Whalers on their home court the previous weekend, while Barrow grabbed the win in their first meeting in Anchorage in December.

Jeremy Head's career-high 36 points in the championship game of the Valdez Elks' Tournament were not enough to overtake Barrow on Saturday night. The Whalers built up a 10-point lead by halftime and held steady with solid shooting in the second half to take the win 70-60. Mason Evans contributed 10 to Nome's effort, backed by Mikey Wongittilin with eight Tim Sullivan with six. Evans and Head were both named to the all-tournament team.

Barrow was led by tournament MVP Tyler Adams, who racked up 23 points. The loss was only the third of the season for the Nanooks.

Evans led the way for Nome with 23 points in Friday's game against tourney hosts Valdez. The Nanooks were on the more familiar side of the scoreboard with the 77-48 win. Nome was deadly from downtown, nailing 11 of 15 threepointers. A big third quarter with Nome putting up 28 points to the Buccaneers' 12 helped seal the victory. Head scored 14, joining eight other teammates who put points on the board.

The Nanooks started the Valdez tournament with a 67-48 win against Glennallen Feb. 11. Head scored 21 and grabbed 12 rebounds to lead Nome. Sullivan also racked up double digits, scoring 16. Evans added 13.

Nome will next play Chevak this Thursday at home to cap off a full day of basketball in the Nanook den as Nome hosts the 2010 Norton Sound Shootout. Tip-off for the Nome-Chevak game is set for 8 p.m.

Lady Nanooks set to play last home game

The Lady Nanooks suffered a string of three losses after traveling to the Valdez Elks' Tournament last weekend.

Nome came close to a win in their final game Saturday against Houston. However, the Lady Hawks were able to pull out the victory 38-34. The tournament's earlier games proved a little more rocky for the Lady Nanooks.

In Friday's action, Barrow's Kivvaq Nungusak was deadly from outside, draining seven three-pointers to largely drive the Lady Whalers' 67-34 victory. Nungusak scored 27 total to lead the Lady Whalers in the 67-34 win over Nome. The Lady Nanooks were led by Devynn Johnson who notched 10 points in the effort. Johnson was named to the all-tournament team. Hillary Stiles scored eight in the effort, followed by Richelle Horner with six.

Nome started the tournament last Thursday with a loss to Glennallen. Horner led Nome in the 36-47 game with 13 points. Johnson scored all dozen of her points in the second half. The Panthers put considerable distance between themselves and Nome before the half with a 19-9 second quarter. Nome clawed back a bit in the third, but Glennallen again outscored the Lady Nanooks in the fourth. Stiles added seven points in the effort and Dylan Johnson scored four.

Nome will play the last home game of the season this Friday against Chevak. Tip-off is slated for 8 p.m. at Nome-Beltz. The Lady Nanooks will finish out their regular season in Unalakleet Feb. 26-27 before heading to Unalaska for the Western Conference Tournament March 3-6. The conference tournament will determine who advances to the state tourney.

I am writing this with regards to the actions and decisions of the Nome School Board pertaining to the renewal of the 2011-2012 contracts for Principal Janeen Sullivan and Assistant Principal Doug Boyer. I was shocked and appalled when I first heard the news, then further disturbed by their continued ignorance of policy and refusal to hear the community's wishes regarding this situation. Even worse, the reasons for these actions still have not come to As a student attending UAF, I have heard much discussion among the education majors about the situation in Nome. None of these bright, diverse, and dedicated future teachers, principals, and other education workers would choose to be employed in an environment where they could be put out of work without any evident reason. They see Mrs. Sullivan's perfect track record and wonder why, after 20 years of service, would this outstanding individual suddenly be stripped of her responsibilities. They look at Mr. Boyer, who has done nothing but good for Nome-Beltz, and speculate why this role model is out of a job. Is this the kind of message we want to send to the future of the education system?

I personally remember the excitement of the students the day that it was announced that Mrs. Sullivan was to be the new principal. As I walked through the halls, I could almost feel a new, positive energy about the school. I implore the School Board to mend the wounds they caused, and make the right choice to reverse their decision. Jenna Schmidt

Nome/Fairbanks, AK

Dear Editor:

I must preface this letter stating that according to policy, I must abide by the recent majority vote; however, I do not lose my First Amendment rights because I am a member of the Nome School Board. My immediate concerns are primarily related to policy, procedure and precedence and I am outraged by the conduct of the board.

Much of the Nome community personally witnessed irresponsible acts through board actions at two recent school board meetings. The first occurred on January 7 when three of the board members chose to disregard our superintendent's recommendation, a superintendent we hired that has dedicated his life to education and possesses a vast knowledge and working relationship with the current administrative team - HIS TEAM! Mr. Wehde actually begged the school board to approve his slate of administrators. The second was February 9 when four of our board members sat silent and refused to second a motion to rescind a previous motion, even after two of those members agreed to place it on the agenda. Were they simply appeasing the public in front of them when they agreed to place it on the agenda, knowing full well it would never amount to anything?

Nome Public Schools has adopted the Board Standards from the Association of Alaska School Boards. In part, these specifically state, "The only employee who answers directly to the School Board is the superintendent. If there is a problem with one of the administrators who reports to the superintendent, it is the responsibility of the superintendent to handle the issue. You should certainly let the superintendent know what you've seen or heard, but be very careful not to overstep the line into micromanaging the relationship with this administrator." Board members should not take it upon themselves to gather information against any District employee. It is clear the school board has overstepped its governing role into micromanagement and is misguided.

Here is a quote from an e-mail I received from one of our board members that certainly shows proof that there was misuse of position by making a decision based on THEIR evaluations of the administrators in question, 'I know that you are trying to cry foul because not one of us specifically looked at each paper evaluation, but rather WE took the total value of the job that either employee is doing in their current positions.' A school board member does not have the knowledge necessary to be able to take 'the total value of the job' - and again, the school board does NOT evaluate the administrators. That is why there is an evaluation process that includes many categories of duties and is completed by the Superintendent.

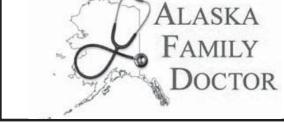

There is also an Alaska Statute -AS 44.62.310 that all School Boards must follow. It states that the motion to go into executive session 'must clearly and with specificity describe the subject of the proposed executive session and there are only three reasons an executive session can be held. The motion our board made was to 'personnel matter'. This motion did not accurately explain to the public why an executive session was necessary. If the board was entering into an executive session to discuss confidential evaluation documents, it needed to state that. However, since we did not review any evaluation documents, the executive session falls under a different category of the Statute, 'subjects that tend to prejudice the reputation and character of any person, provided the person may request a public discussion.' We did not invite either administrator to request a public discussion, nor did we invite them into the session. Gloria Karmun expressed for the record at the January 26 meeting that 'I have no interest in seeing the evaluations as that is a personnel matter.' That clearly shows, again, that the evaluation documents Mr. Wehde had at the January 7 meeting were not reviewed. And further, the executive session motion was 'Personnel Matter.' Confusing isn't it?

As school board members, we are approached by members of the community who wish to share concerns. It is our duty to relay these concerns to the superintendent and in turn his duty to investigate the validity of such. There have been absolutely no discussions brought forth at board meetings that would indicate an investigation of concerns, rumors, complaints or hearsay heard by individual board members have been validated. That is policy and that is how the board should be operating. If a concern is not validated, it should not come into play, period! It is hard for one to imagine that the majority of an elected board could disregard the facts and bring personal agendas to the table and to totally disregard the will of the people.

This is very interesting. Alaska Statute 14.20.175 states that a teacher who has acquired tenure rights (as has one of our administrators), can be nonretained only for the following causes, 1a) the school district demonstrates that the district has fully complied with the requirements of AS 14.20.149 (which is plan of

How to Rehabilitate the Twisted Ankle

By Bob Lawrence, MD

Winter activities can be hard on the ankles. Both outdoor and indoor winter sports put ankles at risk of a twisting-type injury. Even activities as simple as walking outdoors over ice can put ankles in danger.

The most common ankle injury is the ankle sprain, which, depending on its severity, may lead to a few moments of discomfort or an all-out visit to the

Regardless of severity, a few basic actions taken early can greatly improve the healing time and prevent further damage to the ankle.

At the time of injury it is important to initiate the steps of the P-R-I-C-E-D pneumonic: Protect the joint from further injury with a brace, splint, or elastic bandage; Rest the ankle; Ice the affected area for 15 minutes every several hours; Compress the area with an elastic bandage to prevent the collection of blood in the joint; and \underline{E} levate the ankle to reduce swelling. Some people add the "D" to indicate that Drugs like acetaminophen or ibuprofen may be taken for pain.

At some point after medical evaluation and treatment, the patient with an ankle injury will be cleared for rehabilitation. Patients who return to full activity before going through rehabilitation predispose themselves to a second, often more serious, injury. The steps of rehabilitation are simple but very important: restore range-of-motion; stretch and strengthen the joint; and reestablish proprioceptive control.

The first step involves restoring range-of-motion by moving the ankle through its six major motions: up, down, right, left, inversion, and eversion (inward and outward twisting of the ankle). This prevents prolonged stiffness in the joint. The patient starts by pivoting the ankle up and down like pushing on a gas pedal. Then, when tolerated, the ankle is turned and rotated from side-to-side. Some people find it helpful to draw the A-B-Cs with the foot moving the ankle through its full range of motion. This exercise should be done multiple times throughout the day during rehabilitation.

The second step involves stretching and strengthening the ankle. This is best accomplished against resistance or with the use of an elastic band to stretch and then strengthen the muscles that move the ankle and the tendons that cross the joint. Again the ankle is moved through each major motion this time against resistance. Resistance training strengthens the ankle and, in a sense, encourages the formation of an internal ankle brace since the ligaments of the ankle heal along lines of force.

The final, and arguably the most important step in ankle rehab, involves teaching the brain to trust the ankle again. This is called proprioceptive training. Sports medicine doctors and physical therapists often recommend the use of a balance board or rocker board during this step. In the absence of a balance board, a simple home technique is to stand on one foot while doing something else like lifting light weights, dribbling a basketball, or watching the Olympics on HDTV. This stork-like maneuver or use of a balance board forces the brain to trust the ankle in various positions allowing for the restoration of normal movement when walking, running, or playing sports.

Repeat injuries are not uncommon. The use of a lace-up ankle brace or the use of ice-grip shoe wear should be used when possible to help prevent a re-

Rehabilitation of an ankle injury can take weeks to months depending on the severity of the injury, but experts agree that the time invested is well worth the effort because proper rehabilitation will shorten the healing time and reduce the risk of future injury.

Saying it Sincerely

Respond with Love By Fr Ross Tozzi, St Joseph Parish for the Nome Ministerial Association

Toward the end of World War II, the city of Rome was liberated and American soldiers enjoyed a new freedom to travel around the countryside more easily. Three American GI's decided they would make a visit to San Giovanni in order to see Padre Pio. Two soldiers were eager to go, Wally, the third, was dragged kicking and screaming. "Why go? This man Padre Pio is a fraud. I don't believe he is a mystic. I don't believe any of the miracles. I certainly don't believe he bears the image of the heavenly one. In fact, I don't even believe at all." Despite his protests, Wally's buddies dragged him along even though Wally made it clear in every way possible that he did not want to go.

At the church, the three GI's came within an arms length of Padre Pio. At close range, Wally challenged Padre Pio, very publicly and very rudely. "Show me your wounds." Padre Pio bore the marks of the crucified Christ with nail marks in his hands, feet and side. Padre Pio had been given strict orders not to reveal these wounds in public. Church officials did not want him to be some type of side show at a carnival so they had ordered him to keep his hands and feet wrapped to hide the wounds.

But Wally persisted. "Show me your wounds." Padre Pio refused. Instead he countered, "No, show me your wounds." The altercation went back and forth seemingly getting nowhere. "Show me your wounds." "No, show me your wounds.

Then Padre Pio helped Wally to understand the wounds were his sins. Padre Pio said once again, "Show me your wounds." In a quiet corner of the church, away from the eyes and ears of all, Wally broke down in tears and wept like a baby.

The horror of war had deeply wounded Wally in ways that were not visible. His nights were sleepless. He felt tremendous guilt for having survived a battle that had decimated his platoon. Almost everyone in his platoon was cut to shreds, killed, and maimed and yet he remained, physically fit but with a deep, deep wound to his soul. Wally cried and confessed and bore his wounds to Padre Pio. Calling to mind that scene in the Gospel of John (20: 19-23) where Jesus shows his wounds to the fearful disciples and dispels their fears, Padre Pio healed the inner wounds of Wally through the power of the Holy Spirit.

When someone attacks you verbally, will you turn the other cheek or will you let the aggressor's anger and hatred turn your soul as black as ash? Jesus challenges us to love our enemies. In loving Wally, Padre Pio led a man back to faith, back to life and back to God.

When someone attacks you, will you recognize the opportunity to respond with love, mercy, patience and compassion? Or will you give in to the great temptation to raise your voice and respond in a like manner? "Love your enemies, do good to those who hate you, bless those who curse you, pray for those who mistreat you." (Luke 6:27-28)

With God's help, all things are possible. The Gospel is not naive and unrealistic. The Word of God is not an open door for abusive personalities to control others and treat them like doormats. And the Word of God also prohibits ruthless judgments, judgments that are merciless. It criticizes those who condemn the sinner. Rather, the Word of God challenges us to respond with love.

perintendent. Because an administrator was UNANIMOUSLY retained, they could NOT have committed any of the above. Those are compelling reasons as provided by law. Please read between the lines. Not wishing to divulge executive session conversation, I can assure you there was NO compelling information discussed.

My second concerns are directly related to our community, district, staff and students. The effect of this decision will have a huge negative affect and continue to be detrimental for a long time. A survey was recently completed in conjunction to the development of a five-year Strategic Plan. The question "What are the greatest challenges for issues NPS has to address over the next five years in order to provide a quality education for all students?" The #1 reply was "Hiring and retaining quality educators in an increasingly competitive environment." 71.4 percent of those surveyed chose this as our biggest challenge. I have received numerous phone calls and e-mails and can say that we have a large percentage of our teachers and other staff wondering if they should sign their new contracts. We also have a large percentage of teachers actively seeking other employment. Who out there would put their self and their families in a position to be employed by a district where the board can, for any reason or no reason, go against the recommendations of the superintendent, and risk losing their job, even if they have excellent evaluations and there is no cause? Who will apply to work for NPS? These recent board actions are making the airwaves all across the state and are not flattering.

There are also many parent and teacher e-mails and letters. If you would like to read them, please contact the district. I ask those who have written letters to the board to please address them to the editor and submit them for the public to read. The public needs to be informed of the injustices that have been allowed to

I encourage each of you who feels that the school board has made a reckless decision, disregarded policy and Alaska Statute; feel the decision as it stands will negatively impact our community and children, to voice your concerns loudly until there is resolve! This community deserves a school board that has the best interests of the students in mind when making each and every decision. That is the oath taken by each.

Board Bylaw 9020 states, "The board believes that it should hold itself to high standards of performance, accountability and conduct in order to meet the public trust that has been bestowed by the public election of each member." I stand by this bylaw wholeheartedly.

Barb Nickels Community Member Nome, AK

Dear Ms. McGuire, I would like to correct two of the more significant errors in the stories about NSEDC in the February 11th edition of the Nome Nugget. The first was in the front page story by reporter, Laurie McNicholas, which stated that the NSEDC "board unanimously approved" a proposal put forward by a local group and speculated on the nature of this proposal. In fact, the board did not approve any investment related to this group at its February 5 meeting. The Board's motion was to move forward as discussed in executive session. This essentially directed staff to look into how NSEDC might be able to work with the group, and by doing so, create jobs and foster economic development in the region.

The second error was in another story, by the same reporter, where it was reported that Icicle Seafoods is reviving the Norton Sound herring sac roe fishery. Rather, this is a joint venture approach in which NSEDC staff, along with board members of herring fishing communities, have been working with Icicle Seafoods to negotiate terms to bring a herring processor to the region. Further, we have not yet come to an agreement, but discussions are continuing in an effort to facilitate the fishery in 2010 and we hope to have good news to report to our region's herring fishermen soon.

NSEDC hopes that these corrections will eliminate any confusion that the stories may have caused. We understand that writing accurate stories about discussions held in execu-

Rita Tavis

Rita Tavis died February 10, 2010 at 3:10 a.m. Rita Tavis was born Rita Catherine O'Leary in Teller on March 6, 1920. She was the daughter of John and Eleanor O'Leary. Mr. O'Leary had a mining camp 20 miles from Teller at the confluence of Gold Run and Blue Stone River. Rita graduated from the Nome High School in 1937 and had a two-year scholarship to the Agricultural College and School of Mines in Fairbanks.

In 1939 she was unable to return to college because of her father's illness and financial needs. She went to work for the U.S. Smelting and Refining Company as a secretary. After she went to the mining company, she was married to Wilbur Tavis of Seattle, but later divorced. After the birth of her son, Gene Michael Tavis, she went to work for Alaska Star Airlines, the predecessor of Alaska Airlines, and then worked for Pan American Airways in Nome until 1947. Then she was transferred to Honolulu, Hawaii where she stayed until 1951 when she went to Los Angeles and worked for El Al Israel Airlines. In 1957 with her mother and two children in a brand new Chevrolet, they drove to Seattle and then up the Alcan to Anchorage, where her two brothers, Gus Stienwandel and Charles O'Leary then resided. She returned to the same college, then called the University of Alaska in Fairbanks, and in 1960 was awarded a Bachelor of Education degree. She worked for the Anchorage School District for 23 years. In 1972 she was awarded a Master of Arts degree from the University of Alaska in Anchorage and retired in 1982. In 1992 wanting to be closer to her two children, she left Anchorage and went to Cocoa, Florida.

She leaves two children, her son, Gene Michael Tavis and his wife. Kay St. Onge of Fayetteville, Tennessee, and her daughter, Laurie Zweiback, of Cocoa, Florida. She also leaves three grandchildren and six great-grandchildren. No funeral was planned. The memorial Mass will be said for her and her ashes returned to Alaska.

Dear Editor,

I just learned that this is the 140th anniversary of the National Weather Service. With that in mind I want to thank the folks at our local weather service office. We all love to smugly criticize when their forecast is inaccurate, but where else in the country can you place a call 24 hours/day and get a live and friendly voice happy to take a personal look at the latest weather information to help you decide if it is wise time to plan a trip by boat or snowmachine, and which direction would be most advisable.

Less known is that our local weather service forecasters have been compassionate and sensitive players in the operation of the coldweather emergency shelter, helping NEST predict nightly temps to determine if the shelter will open, and even putting in shifts at the shelter.

You're the best! Sue Steinacher and NEST Nome, AK

Dear Editor:

Hey,I just got so bugged that I just had to drop a line again. I was at a meeting where a person inferred that I was being nice so that I might find a boyfriend. That is so not true. I don't need a guy to be happy, I have my kids.

Don't forget—it's census time. We must all be counted—because YOU MATTER! Don't be an idiot. If you don't have an address, or stay with other people, make sure you're on a paper in the town you are in. Find the census person or call (907) 249-2900 to see how you sign up. We would appreciate it. That is how we get the dollar amount the government allots to our state for spending. So if you would like to get more money projects that need to be done, then everyone has to be counted! Deadline is April 1, 2010.

Although it may be hard for me to get a job because I feel I must say my piece and often seem to ask questions at the wrong time, I still feel blessed to be able to live where I do, and that is because I have faith in God. He leads my way, and He is good to me and my family.

So, as my parents and grandparents taught me to do, be nice and feed people, make them feel welcome, I will ever do. I am glad I get to meet you all and learn all the different things you teach me—know I am blessed. Do take care, and be nice to each other. It is not right to hurt people; we are only supposed to help each other.

At least I enjoy saying "So I can go out and get some more." It is so beautiful out there. Man—you ought to see my pictures. And it's outside by doorway—lucky me.

Well, I gotta go now. Still have never ending kids to get to bed, cause I have to work in the morning. Oh well. At least they're safe. As always,

Application for recall lands at City Hall

By Tyler Rhodes

Residents upset with the Nome Board of Education's decision to let go of the top two administrators at the junior/senior high school have filed applications for recall petitions with the City of Nome for four of the five school board members

The four applications delivered to City Hall Feb. 23 ask for a recall vote for board members Gloria Karmun, Kirsten Timbers, Heather Payenna and Albert McComas. The sole board member not targeted by the campaign is Barb Nickels.

The recall effort is a response to the board's January decision to not offer contracts to Nome-Beltz principal Janeen Sullivan and assistant principal Doug Boyer for next year. The board's split decision came after a lengthy closed-door session Jan. 12. The board members have never publicly stated their reasons for not renewing the contracts.

The decision created a polarizing uproar in the community that has resulted in two heavily attended board meetings, each with lengthy public comment periods where a majority of community members speaking expressed dismay at both the board's decision and its refusal to say why the call was made.

Calls have also been made in defense of the board, albeit from a smaller contingent, many making the case that if Nome voters had enough confidence in the board members to vote them in, then the community

Hospital orders utility connections worth $6.5 million

By Sandra L. Medearis

Nome Joint Utility System has worked out a draft connection agreement to extend power lines and water and sewer service to the new Norton Sound Regional Hospital going up at the east end of town.

NJUS ratepayers will not have to pay for the upgrades that will hold existing customer service lines harmless from the hospital's heavy power demands and will improve water delivery to the northeast section of town and Icvview. NIUS stands to collect a $3 million down payment on the work almost immediately.

The federal Indian Health Service is building the hospital and will pay engineers' estimated construction cost by paying a service connection fee of $1.56 million. The line will run north of town from the Snake River Power Plant, west of the cemetery, underground along Little Creek Road and then overhead along Bypass Road and Seventh Avenue to the hospital site. The feeder lines will satisfy an anticipated 1.5-megawatt draw from the electric power system.

The existing utility lines could not handle the demand without upgrades, according to NJUS manager John K. Handeland. Building the new feeder will accommodate the larger load, avoid disruption of service to customers and allow NJUS to restore power to the hospital on a priority basis following a service disruption. IHS needed a fixed cost, and Handeland feels the $1.56 million is a solid estimate.

be exceeded, NJUS would have to pay the difference, but if we come in for less, that would be profit for NJUS," he told NJUS board members at a Feb. 16 meeting.

NJUS will collect the precise amount, $1,561,600 right away beginning $500,000 at contract signing, followed by another half million on or before March 1, and $561,000 when NJUS completes the construc-council to endorse the Steadman Street site as the city's preferred location for a new Nome state office building and to agree to vacate the Sixth Avenue right of way at the site.

In a phone interview with The Nome Nugget following the meeting, Bahnke said she drafted the proposed resolution at the request of Department of Transportation engineer Matt DeSalenrnos, who wants to know whether the council will endorse the site before spending thousands of dollars in state funds to develop an application and preliminary plat for review by the Nome Planning Commission.

The draft resolution states that the city previously endorsed both the state office building project and the Steadman Street site for the project through Resolution No. R-08-12-03 and in material presented to the Alaska Legislature in the city's 2009 state legislative priorities package.

If the commission approves a final plat for the site, an ordinance adopted by the council to vacate the Sixth Avenue right of way is required for construction of a state office building on the site.

Councilwoman Mary Knodel suggested that all council members carefully read a report on the condition of the current state office building on Front Street provided to them Monday by Larry Smithheisler of the DOT. The three-volume report detailed results of studies conducted in 1994 of exterior envelope corrosion, heating and ventilation controls and a condition survey and deficiencies report. A memo by DeSalernos dated Sept. 26, 2007 is attached to the report.

In the memo DeSalernos summarized damage caused by a major storm in the fall of 1974 when the building was new and subsequent storm damage and flooding in 2004 and 2005. He estimated the costs of structural repair and new siding at $2.5 million, HVAC system renovations at $2 million and life safety upgrades at $1.5 million. Costs for the temporary relocation of the building's current occupants were not included in the estimates, he noted.

City Clerk Sandy Sturgis-Babcock said DeSalernos will be in Nome on March 8, the date of the next regular council meeting. The council scheduled a work session with him at 6:30 p.m. prior to the meeting.

New business

The council heard first reading of a proposed ordinance to lease additional space at the Gold Hill Tutit Ininat Child Ĉare Building to Kawerak Inc. for a day care program for children called the Uiviilat Play and Learn Center. Kawerak has asked to lease two additional rooms at the city-owned facility for $2 per square foot for office space from March 1 through Dec. 31, 2010, at which time its current lease expires. The council voted to move the ordinance forward to the next regular meeting for a second reading, public

Dear Editor,

Both the Recall ad on the back page of last week's Nugget and your editorial in the same issue promoted recall of "The School Board". It's important for concerned parents, citizens and voters to understand that The Recall effort is directed at Albert McComas, Heather Payenna, Kirsten Timbers, and Gloria Karmun — the members of the NSB who violated their own policy, the policy of the Alaska Association of School Boards, and state law regarding executive session.

Barb Nickels is NOT a target of The Recall! Indeed, Ms Nickels is the only NSB member who has, from first to last, fulfilled the requirements of her oath of office, her sworn duty to follow policy and law and to recognize her obligation to Nome's school children and their parents in this matter. She's the only one to stand up against petty tyranny and gross violations of her oath of office and of the public trust. Ms Nickels is and should be regarded as the most ethical, honest, and fearless member of our School Board. To repeat, Barb Nickels is NOT a target of The Recall! Jana Varrati Nome, AK

What's the Plan?

What's our town to look like in years to come? The State says it wants to build a humungous office building and put it at the end of Steadman near the Rec Center? What's to become of the old state office building? Meanwhile the feds are trying to unload the Post Office Building. We have some rather large vacant lots downtown on Front Street. Are they large enough to hold a big state office building, or could we build two smaller ones?

If we put a big state building at the north end of town, where will the employees go for lunch? Maybe they will just pack peanut butter sandwiches. Do we want office buildings at the north end of town or do we want to keep that area residential? Is that old Gold Company land free of contaminants? Should the area around the Rec Center be kept open for outdoor recreation? It sure would be nice to have a track, tennis courts and an ice rink. Should Front Street continue to be a business area? What about more hotels? What will happen to shops and restaurants if there are no businesses downtown? Want happens to folks who don't have transportation and have to walk to the post office and the banks and pay their phone and utility bills and conduct business?

Should we not consolidate our business and residential areas? Should we get rid of that butt ugly building east of City Hall and plan for parking and areas where a person can sit down, have a sandwich and enjoy the sun? How will we promote tourism and make our town visitor friendly? Where will our houses be located? Will our seawall hold for heavy-duty storms? Will global warming and high water force us to move to the top of Anvil Mountain? What do we think? Tell the Planning Commission and the City Council. Get involved in the Nome of the future. - N.L.M.-

The Nome State Office Building:

Where should it be located?

By Matt Desalernos, DOT senior project manager

Recently there has been some growing controversy surrounding the Nome State Office Building replacement project. In response to this controversy I felt like it would be a good idea to write this opinion piece for the Nugget so that interested local residents can get a better understanding about the project.

Many of you will remember me from having lived in Nome for over 25 years. As a former long term resident, I completely understand the attachment many long term residents have for Front Street and the concern they have about its further decline. A number of questions have come up so I've tried to address as many as I can in the "Q And A" format below. If you still have additional questions please feel free to contact me via phone (907) 269-0869 or email matt.desalernos@alaska.gov.

Q. What's going on with the project and how did you get involved?

A. I am a project manager for the Statewide Public Facilities section of DOTPF. For those unfamiliar with us, Statewide Public Facilities is the "PF" in DOTPF. We are pretty much a separate entity to the rest of DOT. Our function is to manage capital improvement projects for nearly all the building projects that the various state agencies need. Our group handles a variety of projects from Fish Hatcheries to the renovation of Ted Stevens Airport, along with a multitude of smaller projects. We assist the Owner agencies by managing these projects through design and construction. Once the agencies take occupancy we generally step back and the agencies then take over with the day to day maintenance and operation of the fa-

The Nome State office building is "owned" and operated by DOT's northern region Maintenance and Operations Section. Other state agencies located in the building such as the Department of Fish and Game, Elections, or Legislative Affairs occupy the building in what amounts to a "landlord-tenant" relationship.

In 2008 Northern Region M&O was able to obtain $1.9 million in capital improvement funds to acquire a site for a new state building and do preliminary design. That's when I was assigned to the project. Subsequent to that assignment I've been working on acquisition of a site and preliminary design.

Q. Why has the state decided to replace the existing state building?

A. The building has a number of serious problems. First of all the building is located in a flood zone and has been severely damaged by major storm events on three occasions. The first time this happened was a year after it was built during the famous 1974 storm. Recent storms have caused additional serious damage. There is substantial risk that another storm event could render the building unsafe for occupancy for an extended period of time. Should this occur it will be very costly for the state to maintain the function of the affected agencies.

In addition to these major storm events, the close proximity to the Bering Sea has taken a toll on the building over time. The constant moisture and salt environment has resulted in measurable corrosion damage to steel structural columns. Severe damage to non structural steel framing has also occurred.

Other problems include an obsolete heating and ventilation system that needs to be replaced, and other upgrades that are needed to bring the building up to date with current building codes.

Extensive repairs of this nature are always quite costly, usually in excess of 85 percent of the cost of new construction. It's not unusual for a renovation effort like this to wind up costing more than it would to construct a new

The renovation process is further complicated by the fact that all of the current occupants must continue to de-

State objects to federal ocean zoning policy

Following a host of meetings, President Barack Obama's Ocean Policy Task Force has come up with a document to overhaul the federal government approach to coastal and marine planning. But the so-called "Coastal and Marine Spatial Planning" framework is drawing flak from the State of Alaska. The ocean task force's framework calls for decrease in user conflicts as groups favoring development and conservation groups frequently clash over development. It calls for a more integrated, comprehensive, ecosystem-based, flexible, and proactive approach to planning and managing uses. The framework also places science-based decisionmaking high and tries to bring all stakeholders to the table.

The first meeting of the task force was held in Anchorage last year, drawing hours of public testimony. But Alaska Governor Sean Parnell is concerned about impacts on Alaska and a lack of engagement with stakeholders, Governor Parnell called on senior Obama administration officials to meet with Alaskans before proceeding with further development of federal marine spatial planning efforts. Parnell said that he is concerned that the ocean zoning proposal, in its current form may be unable to strike a balance between ocean protection and the use of the oceans for commercial purposes, such as outer continental shelf oil and gas development and commercial fishing.

Governor Parnell signs first

SITKA- A bill that would have not gotten any headlines beyond Sitka is now in the spotlight as the first bill signed into law by Governor Sean Parnell. The Senate bill Parnell signed allows low-speed electric vehicles on roads with posted speed limits of 45 mph or less. Previously, the law only allowed electric cars to operate on roads with posted speed limits of 35 mph or less. Parnell signed the bill in Sitka and said that many Alaskan communities such as Sitka have few road miles and low traffic volume, providing a suitable environment for electric cars. At the cost of fuel, maybe Nome will see some e-cars zipping around in the future.

Reports on rural fuel prices find no price fixing, but high delivery costs

ANCHORAGE - Independent of each other, the Alaska Department of Law and the Institute of Social and Economic Research at the University of Alaska Anchorage came out with reports on the pricing of fuel in rural Alaska. The reports agree that rural fuel prices are high because of transportation costs to remote locations and storage costs. The AG's study finds that high wholesale prices in rural Alaska appear to be driven by high delivery, storage and logistical costs. The study also found that the wide disparity in fuel prices within certain regions across rural Alaska is primarily the result of pricing differences among local retailers and their retail margins are smaller than in urban areas.

The study does rule out illegal practices in rural wholesale and retail fuel pricing, but investigators couldn't find any evidence of such illegal activity.

ISER's study is an analysis of the components that make up the costs to deliver fuel to rural Alaska. ISER found that the high costs of transporting fuel long distances to remote and challenging locations that require large storage facilities in isolated communities results in high prices. The Legislature had this issue on their radar screen and has requested these studies.

Governor pushes resource development in Washington

WASHINGTON, D.C — Governor Sean Parnell is in Washington this week and has met with other governors, members of the Obama administration, members of Congress, and business executives. Parnell is a member of the National Governors Association's Natural Resources Committee and participated in a hearing with U.S. Energy Secretary Steven Chu and the Federal Energy Regulatory Board Chairman Jon Wellinghoff. Parnell pushed to amend an Endangered Species Act resolution to put more emphasis on local decision-making and economic development in land use planning decisions.

SAN FRÂNCISCO— The Center for Biological Diversity last week petitioned the Environmental Protection Agency to take action to reduce black-carbon pollution under the federal Clean Water Act. The petition is the first to seek protection of water when in the form of ice. It asks the EPA to set water-quality criteria for concentrations of black carbon on sea ice and glaciers under the Clean Water Act — the first step toward reducing black-carbon emissions from diesel engines and other sources due to their role in accelerating the loss of sea ice and glaciers. The Center's lawyers argue that due to its warming effects in the air and on ice and snow, black carbon is considered one of the largest contributors to global warming after carbon dioxide pollution. Because black carbon stays in the atmosphere for less than a month, however, reductions in black-carbon emissions yield immediate environmental and public health benefits, the Center's lawyer Mark Vespa said. If EPA were to adopt water-quality criteria for black carbon, Alaska as a state with both sea ice and glaciers, would need to adopt the EPA standard or set their own.

tion. The contract commits the hospital owners, Indian Health Service, to buy electric service from NJUS for at least five years.

NJUS will construct, install and maintain water and sewer main line extensions going from Sixth Avenue and K Street to East Seventh Avenue to serve the hospital. The sewer extension will require about 1,050 feet of new arctic gravity sewer main. The new sewer mains will rest on thaw-stable sands and gravel found about a dozen feet below the existing ground level. NJUS will remove ice-rich organic overburden material to ensure sound performance for a predicted project life expectancy of at least 40 years. A review has shown that the treatment facilities have adequate capacity to receive the increased flow from the hospital. NJUS has the right to use the extended water and sewer service to serve other customers, according to the proposed contract. Additionally, the project will include seven new arctic fire hydrants.

The water upgrades will increase the water flow to the northeast quadrant, the Recreation Center and Icyview, and include upgrades to the Sixth Avenue Pump House, Handeland told the board. The hospital and NJUS will share the cost of the water and sewer upgrades, with NJUS throwing money from the state Department of Environmental Conservation into the pot.

"The project will cost $5 million," Handeland said. "We have $2.1 million awarded from state Department of Environmental Conservation to put with $2.9 million in funding from Indian Health Service through Norton Sound Regional Health Corporation."

The contract requires Indian Health Service to pay NJUS $1 million when the contract is signed, another $1 million on or before March 1, and $950,000 when the work has finished.

In other NJUS business, a few days remain before the deadline for putting in pitches to rent heavy equipment to the utility. NJUS has released solicitations for equipment it needs for its 2010 summer construction work. Interested parties can pick up proposal packages at City Hall or at the NJUS office on Port Road. The deadline for returning them is March 1 at 3 p.m.

The board voted to cancel its March 16 meeting that would occur in the hubbub of Iditarod festivities, for example, when some members of the community might be doubly demonstrative in vying for honors in wet T-shirts at a local bar.

The council granted a facility fee waiver request from the Iditarod Trail Committee for use of the Mini Convention Center from March 11-27, 2010.

Utility and port business

The council unanimously adopted an ordinance to approve the FY2010 operations and maintenance budget of Nome Joint Utility System. The NJUS budget includes $13.5 million in estimated revenues and $12.8 million for operations and maintenance expense, with a net operating margin of $717,759. The net margin will fund the 2010 capital improvements budget, annual bond and debt service principal payments, fuel inventory and grant program local participation. These items are not included in the operations and maintenance budget.

An ordinance replacing all of the Port of Nome's existing tariffs with Tariff No. 7 also received the council's unanimous approval. No public comments were presented during public hearings held prior to the adoption of each ordinance.

Letter to Sen. Olson

Mayor Denise Michels sent a letter to Sen. Donald Olson Feb. 19 requesting that Nome be included among recipients of proceeds from the state's excise tax on cruise ship passengers. She also listed funds needed to enhance the Nome port facility.

"As the City of Nome's Port and Harbor facilities are routinely used by cruise ships operating in the Bering Strait, we believe Nome qualifies for state assistance to further develop the port facilities and the Commercial Passenger Vessel Excise Tax (AS 43.52.200-295) may be an appropriate source of funding assistance," Michels wrote. "Since the proceeds are subject to appropriation by the Legislature, we would appreciate your review and confirmation, and we respectfully submit for your consideration the following port-related requests that would dramatically enhance the Nome facility:

• "Installation of High Mast Lighting: Located at the Causeway and Inner Harbor. Estimate cost of $300,000 for each site for a total of $600,000.

• "Public Restrooms: Currently there are no public restrooms at the Causeway. There is a crude outhouse located at the inner harbor. There is a need to replace these facilities with public restroom facilities. Estimate cost of $25,000 for each site for a total of $50,000.

• "Utility Hook Up for Vessels in both the Inner Harbor and Causeway: Install 440v to 4 docks at $125,000 for a total estimate cost at $500,000."

Bowling alley tour planned

The council scheduled a work session at 6 p.m. Monday, March 1 to tour the bowling alley at the Recreation Center to assess requirements for renovating, equipping and reopening the facility. The work session/tour is open to the public.

Executive session

Council members met in executive session following the meeting as requested by Bahnke to discuss financial matters related to the Nome landfill. Councilmen Jon Larson and Jim West Jr. and Mayor Michels were absent from the meeting.

Recall

should trust them in their decisions.

An attempt to bring the issue to another vote at the board's Feb. 9 meeting failed when Nickel's motion to rescind the vote from the Jan. 12 meeting failed to garner a second. Later in that meeting, Nome resident David Head approached the microphone and interrupted the meeting promising a recall effort. The promise appears to have borne fruit.

The applications list Betsy Brennan and Joe Kennedy as the contacts for petition sponsors. Both are parents of elementary school-aged children in the district. Brennan was a former board member who lost her seat last fall to Karmun.

The grounds the sponsors list for the recall are uniform for each of the four members targeted. Among the allegations are that the members violated the Alaska Open Meetings Act by convening a closed-door session without clearly stating the reason why; discussed principal Janeen Sullivan in the executive session, in ways that might prejudice her, without notifying her that she was being discussed, and without giving her an opportunity to require a public discussion or to waive any applicable confidentiality rights; acted against its own board policies in its handling of the two contracts; and violated state law by "failing to require, or subverting an evaluation system that required, implementation of plans for improvement of administrator Janeen Sullivan before nonretaining her without any reason, and against the superintendent's recommendation."

The applications, each bearing the signatures of 10 registered voters from Nome, are the first step in a recall effort. In the interest of full disclosure, Nome Nugget editor and publisher Nancy McGuire is one of the 10 to have signed. McGuire has been an outspoken opponent of the board's decision, writing a series of scathing editorials.

The applications will be examined by the city attorney who will determine if the stated grounds for the recall have enough merit to allow the process to go forward.

If the recall application is not a vote, the board members who are deemed sufficient by the city attorney, the sponsors would have to wait at least six months before filing another application.

If the applications do get the green light, petition backers will then be tasked with collecting signatures of registered voters. Within 60 days of the petition's approval, the number of qualified signatures needs to equal or exceed 25 percent of the number of votes cast in the last regular election for the particular board member's seat. While the number of signatures required for each petition will differ, City Clerk Sandy Babcock estimated that 250 registered voters will need to sign to allow the petition to proceed.

If enough qualified signatures are gathered, the petition goes before the Nome Common Council which would have to authorize a recall election. If no regular election is scheduled within between 45 and 75 days of the authorization, the council would have to schedule a special election within 45 days and no later than 75 days from the authorization.

If the effort makes it all the way to the subject of the vote have the opportunity to include a statement of his or her own on the ballot. The grounds for recall listed by the sponsors would also be included on the ballot.

If voters recall any or all of the four board members, the seat or seats become vacant as soon as the election results are certified. If all four members were recalled, the governor would be tasked with appointing two new members. Those two new members and Nickels would then appoint members to the remaining two seats. The board needs to have three seated members before it can appoint additional members. The governor appoints members until there are three seats filled.

Safety Patrol is a group of volunteers that help patrol the streets of Nome during our most festive times of year including PFD, New Year's Eve, and Iditarod. Safety Patrollers do not act as police officers but are encouraged to offer assistance or call the police if they see someone in danger. Volunteers often receive support and encouragement from Nome residents for the service they provide.

Kawerak Wellness welcomes volunteers at any time. If you're interested in volunteering as a Safety Patroller, please call 443-4364. The next patrol will take place in March during Iditarod. City, pet owners deal with animal hospital closure

By Tyler Rhodes

The City of Nome is looking to find alternatives for the area's domesticated animal population while Nome's sole veterinary clinic is indefinitely closed.

The Nome Veterinary Hospital has been closed since January pending an appeal on a licensing issue with the state.

In a town the size of Nome with plenty of pets and only one practicing veterinarian, the loss of veterinary services poses issues for both residents and the local government. "It puts us in a big lurch," said Animal Control Officer Amy Smithhisler. She said while Dr. Derrick Leedy was not under contract with the city, he has always provided the immunization and spay and neuter service for the city's pet adoption program.

Those services were the main driver behind the $150 adoption fee charged by the shelter. Since the city cannot provide for those at the moment, Nome City Manager Josie Bahnke said the fee will be waived in the interim.

Both Smithhisler and Bahnke said the city is investigating whether someone could be brought in monthly to take care of matters like vaccinations and sterilizations. "The Animal Control Officer is actively seeking vets or vet technicians interested in doing vaccinations locally for both the short- and long-term," Bahnke said in an e-mail. "Prior to Frontier Flying Service ending scheduled flights to Fairbanks, the City worked with Homeward Bound, a pet rescue organization that would take stray animals found in Nome. This was a great partnership and we are still looking into the possibility of working with them at a reasonable cost."

The closure also affects how the city would handle dogs that need to be euthanized. With controversy surrounding the handling and dispatching of shelter animals in Dillingham and Houston over the last couple of months, city officials are sensitive to how the issue is dealt with. "What do we do if we have a dog that needs to be put down?" Smithhisler asked.

For those who already have pets in Nome and need veterinary assistance, Leedy recommends calling Pet Emergency or the Southside Animal Hospital in Anchorage. These are the same locations Leedy has referred people to in the past when he has closed his office for travel.

Leedy, Nome's longtime veterinarian, is currently appealing the state's suspension of his license just as 2010 started. The suspension does not involve any charges of misconduct regarding the care or treatment of animals. The issue, rather, stems from reporting requirements Leedy was required to fulfill to adhere to an agreement made with Board of Veterinary Examiners in 2007.

According to state investigator Brian Howes, the 2007 agreement was made after Leedy had reported to the board some misconduct with regulated drugs. Howes said it is rare that a license is completely revoked. "The whole purpose is not to put people out of business," Howes said. "It's trying to figure out some way that allows them to practice." Leedy said the past few weeks have been hard on him, but he was hopeful that the board would allow him to practice again. He said the reporting requirements of the agreement were cumbersome and admitted to getting behind on the paperwork. His appeal should be taken up at the board's next meeting which is currently scheduled for May 7 in Juneau.

Swine flu: The fight is not over yet

The State Department of Health cautions people to not let their guard down

By Diana Haecker

The lull in swine flu news was broken last week when a seemingly healthy 44-year-old woman from Homer died on February 10 after having tested positive for the H1N1 virus. The Alaska Department of Health and Social Services confirmed that the woman was the state's 13th swine flu related fatality. DHSS spokesman Greg Wilkinson said that while the overall numbers of laboratory confirmed cases are down, the threat is far from being over.

The pandemic flu attributed to the virus dubbed H1N1, or swine flu, appeared first in May 2009. The first lab-confirmed case in Alaska appeared toward the end of May and the first death hit home in July.

"When it first came on our radar screen, we had no idea whether this would be a massive killer, a mild outbreak or whether it would cause the same amount of hospitalizations like any other flu," said Greg Wilkinson.

Fearing the worst, the federal government reacted with a massive swine flu vaccination and hygiene education campaign. Greg Wilkinson said he led the Alaska education campaign with a blitz of ads in TV, newspaper, radio and educational materials distributed throughout the state. The state received federal grant money and spent $250,000 on education and outreach.

Data shows that between Sept 1, 2009 and February 13, 2010 a total of 862 people with confirmed influenza and pneumonia were hospitalized. But that number is skewed because not all of the 25 hospitals asked to report are actually sending in their numbers to DHSS, says Wilkinson. Data further shows that those numbers of people hospitalized for the flu peaked in the middle of November before slightly decreasing in December and again rising in January.

The virus affected all ages, children, the elderly as well as people who were seemingly healthy and those ailing before being infected with the flu. Wilkinson said that the latest swine flu victim from Homer was a healthy and active middleaged woman with no pre-existing conditions. "Still, the doctors couldn't save her," he said. Wilkinson added that there were people who died with pre-existing conditions, people with no preexisting but who were hit with the flu and pneumonia. Also, some victims had both bacterial and viral infections going on at the same time.

Wilkinson said that there are still vaccinations available and that epidemiologists encourage people to get inoculated against H1N1 and to keep washing hands. In Alaska, there were 238,170 doses of H1N1 vaccines distributed and reportedly 133,449 doses administered. Wilkinson cautions that this number may be low as not all public health clinics or hospitals handed in their records of administered vaccinations. But the bottom-line is, there are currently no restrictions on the vaccine, it's here and DHSS encourages everybody to get vaccinated.

As for the seasonal flu, a different strain from the H1N1 virus, Wilkinson reports, "We have not had one single case of seasonal, laboratoryconfirmed seasonal flu in the 2009/2010 flu season in Alaska." While Alaska may lag behind in this respect, the World Health Organization reports that the seasonal flu in China, Africa and Asia is on the rise.

Wilkinson said that there is no way in telling if the combination of vaccinations and the education campaign worked, but that the peak of the flu season has apparently waned -for now. He is quick to point to historic data showing that the seasonal influenza - based on rapid and cultureconfirmed flu tests - peaks in Alaska between February and April. This may or may not reflect what the swine flu is up to. But it means one thing for Wilkinson. "We are not out of the woods yet," Wilkinson said. "In the 1918 flu pandemic, it was the third wave of the flu coming back and killing millions of people. We're not letting our guard down because we are not convinced that it's over."

Snow problem

Norton Sound representatives shrug off snow to meet with Senator Begich

Coffee with constituents is generally the Thursday morning norm in Sen. Mark Begich's Washington, D.C., office.

With a record amount of snowfall on the ground Feb. 11, business as usual had to be scrapped that as Washington ground to a halt and the Senate office building felt like a ghost town.

Nevertheless, Begich and his staff came to work, coffee was served and Nomeites were there to drink it.

With the normal coffee and catering services snowed out, Begich's staff was tasked with baking cookies and brewing its own java, wondering if anyone would show. The question was quickly answered when the first staffer arriving at the office just before 8 a.m. was surprised to find five visitors representing Nome already waiting.

The group associated with Norton Sound Health Corp.—Board Chair Emily Hughes, President and CEO Carol Piscoya, attorney John Bioff, Finance Director Stephanie James and DOWL Engineering's Jay Farmwald—were in town to meet with legislators and the Indian Health Service in regard to the new hospital in Nome.

Begich's office stayed open as much of the federal government shut down to weather the blizzard. Moved from its normal conference room, the Feb. 11 constituent coffee started in one of Begich's smaller front offices. When the Norton Sound delegation was joined by the Whittier mayor and constituents from Anchorage, the event had to spill out into the hallway to accommodate everyone.

Word was Sen. Lisa Murkowski's office was also running business as usual, undaunted by the snow.

While a few feet of snow on the ground may have been enough to shut down the federal government, it likely only made the Alaskans feel countability Responsibility and Disclosure Act of 2009. The bill passed congress and was signed into law by President Obama on Monday. Federal laws that prohibit guns in federal facilities, including NPS visitor centers are still enforced.

Senate passes bill to increase penalties on underage drinking

JUNEAU—The State Senate passed a bill that increases the amount of money fined for alcohol violations by minors. The bill would increases civil damages from $1,000 to $1,500 for minors who knowingly enter or remain in premises licensed to sell alcohol, people who solicit or purchase alcohol for anyone under the age of 21, and people with restrictions on purchasing alcohol. Additionally, the bill encourages education programs as part of sentencing in civil action suits for youths to have a better understanding of how alcohol affects their bodies. The bill now goes to the House of Representatives for its consideration.

Legislature ponders bills to limit corporate influence on elections

JUNEAU- Three Democrats last week introduced legislation to curb unrestricted corporate financial influence on elections, as it was handed down by the U.S. Supreme Court in form of a ruling last month. The country's highest court ruled that corporations have the same rights as people to influence elections. That ruling reversed decades of settled Supreme Court precedent saying states could limit the election spending of corporations. Senator Hollis French, D-Ânchorage, along with Representative Les Gara, D-Anchorage, and Representative Scott Kawasaki, D-Fairbanks, sponsored Senate bill 284 and House bill 358. The bills would provide clear disclosure requirements for corporations participating in electioneering. Corporations would have to report how much money they spend on a given election to the Alaska Public Offices Commission.

Advertisements for or against a candidate would also have to include a "paid for by" disclaimer. Corporations should not be allowed to buy their favorite candidates into office, said Representative Les Gara. He added that with oil companies seeking billions in tax giveaways, there's a danger they will use their money to attack candidates who stand up for the public's interests over corporate interests. If passed, Alaska would join other states considering laws asserting that corporations are not "persons" for purposes of campaign contributions. Passage of similar legislation by a majority of states could strengthen a future challenge to the Supreme Court's decision that corporations are "persons" under election financing laws. Both bills have been referred to the State Affairs and Judiciary Committees.

Alaska attorney general Dan Sullivan last week issued a legal opinion after analyzing the impacts on Alaska campaign finance statutes from the Supreme Court ruling. According to the opinion, current Alaska state law prohibiting independent expenditures by corporations and unions in a candidate election would be unconstitutional after the U.S. Supreme Court's decision. Sullivan said that the high court decision left many Alaskans, including policymakers, uncertain about how campaign financing might be affected in this election year. He added that the ruling does not directly impact Alaska's laws regarding coordinated expenditures, ballot measure expenditures, contributions to candidates, or reporting and registration requirements.

REGIONAL

Neal Foster settles in as district's representative

By Diana Haecker

The 26th Alaska Legislature is in full swing with education, energy and mega-projects like the Road to Nome being discussed in Juneau. House District 39 Representative Neal Foster stepped into his late father Richard Foster's job and responsibilities and learns the ropes as a freshman representative.

Nome Nugget: How are you getting adjusted and settling into your new job in Juneau?

Neal Foster: Great! I'd been coming here for the past 20 years in both a personal capacity to visit my dad and also in a professional capacity as a member of the Alaska Workforce Investment Board. I'd gotten to know a good number of people down here and since politics involves building trust and personal relationships those trips gave me a good foundation. I've found other members of the legislature to be incredibly welcoming and helpful. One of the biggest reasons for the ease with which I've moved into this job is my staff. Larry [Labolle] used to be the superintendent of schools in Nome and the lower Yukon. He has over 20 years of experience working with my dad in the legislature. Paul [Labolle] is going into his ninth year working here in the legislature. They both know who the key players are and how to get things done

NN: What expectations did you have going into your first term as a Representative and what are the re-

NF: My expectation and priority is to keep funding going to our communities in House District 39. The reality is there are 39 other Representatives and 20 Senators all vying for a limited amount of funding. We are fortunate in that oil prices are high and creating a surplus. Last year no discretionary capital projects were funded. This year, the projection is for $200 million. But as mentioned, the reality is that splitting that amount up between so many other districts will be challenging. I was honored to be appointed to the house Finance Committee because it's rare for a freshman legislator to be given this opportunity. I think this will help us as we try to maintain that funding to House District 39. I am also part of the Bush Caucus and as a group we have a good deal of influence.

NN: What are the issues that you work on currently?

NF: I have co-sponsored HB 278, which adds a voucher to Alaska Housing Finance Corporation's rebate program as it pertains to the weatherization program. Currently individuals who are under a certain income level can get weatherization up front. Individuals who make more than that are expected to pay for the weatherization upgrades out of pocket (up to $10,000) and then get a rebate after the work has been done. However, many people are caught in the middle with making too much money to qualify for the improvements to be made up front and yet they have too little disposable income - especially with the high cost of energy - to pay for the upgrades themselves. A voucher would allow them to not have to front the money themselves. The voucher would in effect be a promissory note from AHFC and the State of Alaska saving that the contractor doing the work will be paid.

NN: What do you think is, or are, the most important issue(s) of this 26th legislature that you want to

NF: My priorities for this and future sessions are:

- 1. To increase jobs. I currently sit on the finance subcommittee for commerce and economic develop-
- 2. To improve infrastructure. I also sit on the finance subcommittee for transportation.
- 3. To reduce energy costs. As mentioned, I co-sponsored HB 278 and am pushing to increase funding from $25 million to $50 million for the renewable energy fund.
- 4. To support subsistence.
- 5. To support funding for public 6. To support education and the Governor's Performance Scholarship with modifications so that a needsbased component is added.

7. To support efforts to combat sexual and physical abuse, but rather than push to put people in jail, I'm focusing on prevention.

NN: What are your thoughts or opinions on the proposed road to Nome?

NF: I sat next to the Governor on a flight to western Alaska last week and asked him if we could expect a road to Nome in the foreseeable future. His comment was that a road all the way to Nome probably was not realistic in the short term He said that this needs to be framed as a "road to resources." I agree that coming up with the billions of dollars required to construct a road today is not realistic. What is realistic is taking it in phases.

NN: Were you briefed on the DOT study? What do you think needs to be done before deciding whether or not the road to Nome is a good idea?

NF: I have been given the basics of the study and the recommendation is to follow the central route. This would connect a number of villages along the Yukon and along the southern Seward Peninsula. What needs to be done is have public meetings in each community to make sure that all concerns are being addressed.

NN: Is there anything you would like your constituents' input on?

NF: I am particularly interested in knowing what basic infrastructure and services are needed in all the communities. All of rural Alaska lags behind our urban counterparts when it comes to quality of schools, public safety, roads, water and sewer etc. It's important that we here in Juneau hear what the needs are and convey that to our fellow legislators.

No boys team was able to make it through the 2010 Norton Sound Shootout basketball tourney in Nome with a clean record. So with the aid of a calculator, Elim was named the victor after a point differential formula placed the Eagles ahead of the two other teams that went 2-1 for the three-day tournament.

Nome's junior varsity team and Chevak also notched two wins and a loss in the tourney. The point formula put Chevak in second place and awarded Nome third.

Elim beat Nome JV 63-49 and Chevak 72-62. It was Brevig Mission that got the better of the Eagles, taking that game 61-58.

Chevak earned its two wins against Kaktovik, 81-42, and Brevig Mission, 85-76. Nome JV scored wins against White Mountain, 66-33, and Brevig Mission, 71-57.

Kaktovik and White Mountain played each other twice, with Kaktovik coming out on top in each game, 57-41 and 58-51.

Donald Saccheus from Elim was named the tournament most valuable player. He was also crowned the free-throw champion. Joining Saccheus on the all-tourney team were Nome's Nathan Blandford, Swenson Tocktoo from Brevig Mission, Oscar Takak from Elim and Cameron Olson from Chevak.

The Nome boys varsity team also got in a game late last week against Chevak. In non-tournament play, Chevak was dealt an 87-32 loss by a Nanook team that has been a force on the court all season. Tim Sullivan and Jeremy Head both put up double-digit scoring numbers for Nome in the game.

Nome's varsity boys will take to their home court for the last time this season in games against Unalakleet.

A senior ceremony honoring the boys will be held on Friday evening before the 8 p.m. game start. Senior cheer members will also be recognized. Saturday's varsity game starts

The Nanooks will then head to Unalaska March 3-6 for the Western Conference Basketball Tournament. Nome will join Barrow, Kotzebue, Dillingham, Hooper Bay, Bethel and Unalaska in the tournament that determines who moves on to state.

Chevak takes the Shootout, Lady Nanooks play last home game

While it took some mathematics to determine the winner of the boys division of the 2010 Norton Sound Shootout basketball tourney in Nome, there was no question as to who won the title for the girls.

Going three for three, the Chevak girls were crowned the 2010 champs after beating White Mountain, Kaktovik and Nome's junior varsity squad en route to the win. Actually, the Chevak girls took a fourth game in nontournament play against Nome's varsity squad on Friday night. The game marked the last home-court appearance by the Lady Nanooks where senior members of the squad were recognized. Hillary Stiles, Billie Cosca, Richelle Horner, Charlotte Mattheis, Iris Warnke-Green and AnnieKate Olson were all honored for their contributions to the team.

Chevak dominated its way to the title, nearly doubling its opponents' score in each of its three tournament games. They defeated White Mountain 70-25, Kaktovik 66-23 and Nome's JV team 48-26.

Scores from Chevak's game against Nome's varsity squad were not available.

Nome's JV team earned runner-up honors after defeating Kaktovik 52-22 and White Mountain 48-24.

White Mountain snuck by Kaktovik in a close 40-38 game.

Chevak and Nome populated the all-tournament team, with Chevak's Chelsea Lake named the most valuable player. She was joined by teammates Misty and Mary Olson. Nome's Dylan Johnson and Chloe Mattheis rounded out the team. Lake also won the free-throw competition.

The Lady Nanooks varsity squad heads to Unalakleet this weekend for Friday and Saturday games. The game will be the last of the regular season before the team heads to Unalaska March 3-6 for the Western Conference Tournament. Nome will be joining teams from Barrow, Kotzebue, Dillingham, Hooper Bay, Bethel and Unalaska to decide who will advance to state.

After running 1,150 miles across a frozen wilderness, the phrase "good dog" doesn't quite cover it.

It is a feat that is spectacular by any measure. Some people do it out of a sense of adventure. Some people do it for fame or notoriety. Others do it out of a will to finish. The dogs, on the other hand, do it for a pat on the head, a bowl of food and the love of their passenger. How to Get a Good Night's Sleep Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor Restorative sleep is an important part of good health. A good night's rest has a positive effect on the immune system, memory, cardiovascular system, metabolism, gastrointestinal system, and overall mood.

But getting a good night's rest is a problem for many people. Nearly 30 percent of adults suffer some degree of sleep disturbance, and by 2012, Americans are expected to spend up to $3.9 billion on sleep medications in pursuit

Problems with sleeping, generically called insomnia, can have many different causes. Chronic illness, medication, social stress, shift work, chronic pain, alcohol use, and sedentary lifestyles all interrupt a normal sleep cycle and affect sleep quality and duration.

Insomnia is a serious health issue because lack of restorative sleep can cause or worsen depression, cardiovascular disease, hypertension, and obesity. Insomnia can also have a profound negative effect on productivity at work and on the ability to cope with daily stressors.

Your medical provider can help rule out serious medical causes of insomnia like obstructive sleep apnea, diabetes, thyroid disease, or depression. Many times problems with sleep disappear once the cause is identified and

For patients without an identifiable medical cause of insomnia, it is tempting to turn to sleeping pills as a solution. However, according to the American Academy of Sleep Medicine, 70-80 percent of patients can benefit from non-pharmacologic therapies and achieve lasting effects without medication.

Before starting medication for insomnia, consider following a few basic recommendations:

- 1) Avoid or limit the use of foods that hamper sleep. Most often this means avoiding the use of caffeinated foods such as coffee, tea, sodas, or chocolate in the afternoon or evenings. Also avoid heavy nighttime snacking. Remember that though alcohol can make you feel sleepy, it prevents the restorative deep stages of sleep, and should therefore be avoided before bedtime.
- 2) Avoid cough and cold medications intended for daytime use since these medications often contain a stimulant.
- 3) Set aside time for daily physical activity. Plan for at least 150 minutes of physical activity each week, avoiding strenuous activity within a few hours of intended sleep.
- 4) Address known social and physical stressors. Schedule stressful problem-solving activities, like working on finances, for early in the day.
- 5) Pursue sources of peace and relaxation by making time for family, friends, hobbies, and faith-based activities.
- 5) Avoid daytime napping if it makes the insomnia worse.
- 6) Train your brain to associate your bed with sleep. Go through the same routine each evening before bed. Avoid watching the television, using the Internet, or snacking while in bed. Wake up at the same time every day, even after a poor night's rest. This will realign your sleep/wake cycle with your 24-hour circadian rhythm.
- 7) Get out of bed if sleep onset is delayed by 20-30 minutes. Experts recommend engaging in light reading or using relaxation techniques when sleep onset is delayed, returning to bed only after feeling sleepy.

Sleep medication may be helpful for some patients in the short-term, but experts agree that long-term benefits come from practicing good sleep habits. A study published last year in the Journal of the American Medical Association showed that patients with chronic insomnia receive the greatest lasting benefit from a brief course of sleep medication (less than 6 months) combined with ongoing training in restoring good sleep habits.

If a good night's rest seems like a distant dream, consider consulting with your provider about specific steps you may take to restore healthy sleep patterns without the use of medication. Your provider can also provide good information regarding the risks, benefits, and proper selection of sleep medication when needed as an adjunct to non-pharmacologic therapies. Rest

Correction

Katya Wassillie from White Mountain has been named to the University of Alaska Fairbanks Dean's List for the fall 2009 semester. The Nome Nugget inadvertently left out Wassillie from a list printed last week that incorrectly noted dean's list honoree Zakoriah Williams was from White Mountain. Williams is from Wasilla.

Students receiving a 3.9 grade point average or higher are placed on the chancellor's list, while those receiving a grade point average of between 3.5 and 3.89 are named to the deans' list.

Corporate Giving
Employees from Nome's Wells Fargo bank donated more than $4,600 last September to two community organizations through the Community Support/United Way fundraising campaign held in September. Wells Fargo then matched the employees' effort to make for a total of nearly $9,400 to be split between the Nome Community Center and the Bering Sea Women's Group.

Statewide, Wells Fargo employees donated a record $206,000 during the company's annual fundraising campaign. The $206,000 donated by Wells Fargo team members in Alaska is the highest total ever and a 35 percent increase over last year. Wells Fargo contributed an additional $198,000 for a total investment of $404,000 in nonprofit organizations

Mary Immingan

Obituary

Mary Immingan

Mary Immingan was born April 3, 1933 and died on October 13, 2009. Mary's birth parents were Charlie and Bessie Ahkinga of Big Diomede Island. After Charlie died, she was raised by Tommy Koonooka in Gambell; Tommy was a beloved father to her. She married Lewis Immingan July 2, 1952 on Savoonga Island.

She had three sons and three daughters; Randy, Richard, Carter, Beverly, Janet and Jessie. Mary and Lewis lived a subsistence lifestyle of hunting and living off the land. Lewis taught his sons to carry on the traditional lifestyle, Mary showed her daughters how to care for their household and passed on the native culture of skin sewing and beading.

In 1959 Lewis accepted a job with BIA and they moved the family to California and resided there until 1963 and then went back home to Savoonga. Lewis and Mary then moved their family to Nome in June

Mary was a skin sewer, she loved to bead, crochet and knit. She also loved the outdoors; she loved to pick her greens and berries. She also loved her Eskimo food. Mary was a stay-at-home mom. She raised her kids while Lewis was a carver and made money for the family.

Mary always appreciated the little things in life, she loved the things many of us take for granted. She loved us, her family, as well as others. She was kind and thoughtful and always made us feel special. She made sure everyone felt comfortable around her. When Mary's daughter Beverly died in 1977, she adopted David and also adopted her granddaughter Beverly. Mary also had a stepdaughter and a stepson, Josephine and Rodney Ungwiluk. Her husband Lewis died in July of Mary loved to have Eskimo feasts with her children and grandchildren. Mary enjoyed spending time with her grandchildren and caring for them during the day. She also loved to work on jigsaw puzzles. Mary always told every one of us to love one another. Because of her belief in God, she would attend services in all churches.

Mary was preceded in death by her parents Tommy Koonooka of Gambell and Charlie and Bessie Ahkinga of Diomede, sisters Betty Peterson of Mountain Village, Ivadell Kazignok of Diomede, Lilly Apangalook, Sadie Seppilu, and brother Harold Koonooka of Gambell; late husband Lewis Immingan of Savoonga, her son Randy Immingan and daughter Beverly Immingan both of Nome; in-laws Solomon and Myrtle Booshu of Nome, Bernice Penayah of Savoonga; her nieces Jane Immingan of Nome, Ila James of Gambell; her grandchildren; Walter Myers, Richard, Davinda and Theresa Okhtokiyuk of Gambell; great-grandson, Hiram Okhtokiyuk of Nome.

Mary is survived by her sisters

Eileen Ozenna, Isabell and Peter Ahkvaluk of Diomede, nephew and niece Gerard and Esther Koonooka, Merlin Koonooka, Job and June Koonooka, Rhoda and Bruce Boolowon of Gambell; her children, Richard and Carter Immingan and Jessie Ouilette of Anchorage, Janet and Clarence Kolerok of Palmer, David and Gigi Immingan and Beverly Immingan of Nome; in-law Agnes Immingan; her grandchildren, Stephanie Okhtokiyuk, Daniel Ouilette, Randy Myers

Cheyenne Myers of Anchorage, Brittney, Bailey, Kelsey, and Avery Immingan, Abbey, Maureen, Barbara, McKenna Russell of Nome and Bim and Prentice Adams of Koyuk; her great-grandchildren, Hiram and Davinda Okhtokiyuk of Anchorage, Frank Kolerok of Palmer, Landon Ouilette of Bellingham, WA, Devron and Alexa Okhtokiyuk of Anchorage, Derrick Myers of Anchorage, and Kodi Vining of Connecticut. Gramma will truly be missed by all.

There are so many people to thank: Thank you for all your prayers. What a miracle it is for us to see our babies again, hold them again, get them up for school, and say "good night, I love you", cook for them, and are here for them. It was so hard for us to think about leaving this world without our loved ones around, all by ourselves. Yes, we made a very big mistake, but I think God puts us through stuff like this to share our story and to be strong. No matter how hard it was to keep going being weak and cold, we kept pushing each other and ourselves. Our babies. Power of love is the greatest. Thank you for all who helped. To all who visited and kept us smiling/laughing. To all who cared for us (NSHC). Thank you so much to those who looked for us in the freezing cold and not giving up! For finding us and bringing us to safety/warmth. To our family everything. Thank you Nome Nugget for printing this. Be very careful in traveling in cold weather, be prepared. Be strong and have faith, keep pushing - never give up. And to Dad, for telling us to "keep going where you want to go."

Thank you!

know who you are.

Saying it Sincerely

By Pastor Everett Arnold, Our Savior Lutheran Church for the Nome Ministerial Society

God's Holy Spirit led Jesus into the wilderness [Luke 4:1-13]. It gave time and place for Jesus to deal with whatever might tempt him and sidetracks him from serving his heavenly father. Jesus sorted out three things that could become temptations. One would be hunger. Two would be influence. Three would be security. He and the devil fought it out over each possibility.

In each of us there are likely some things we crave. There is some temptation just waiting for us to give in. Maybe it's chocolate, especially chocolate mixed in with coffee. [That one gets me!] Or maybe it's a craving to be in control. So anything we say is accepted. And our own opinion matters more than that of any other person. Then again it could be craving God's keeping us safe no matter what stupid thing we do. Those are three temptations that Jesus sorted out and fought out with the devil. They still tempt us. They seem to come with being human. And I guess we could name dozens more temptations if we shared our lists with other persons we trust.

It is important that we sort out what tempts us. That's what I see Jesus doing before He starts his public ministry. And if it was important for even him to do it, it must be just as important for us to sort out what tempts us. That way we might not be 'blind-sided' by our own weakness. We might not be distracted unwillingly. We might not lose sight of what's important to

And we can be prepared to fight it out with the devil. The devil always makes it easy to give in. Something inside us very quietly whispers that word the devil spoke to Jesus. It's the word "if." "If I can't have...." "If I don't "If God doesn't...." Such a little word is "if." But it can drive us like our gas pedal is stuck!

Then we need to turn the key off. And Jesus showed us how. Each time the devil said "if," Jesus answered words of Holy Scripture. "Not by bread alone, but by every word that comes from the mouth of God!" [Matthew 4:4] "Worship...God, and serve only him." "Do not put the Lord your God to the

We could keep this word of scripture handy too: "...give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with the food that is needful for me, lest I be full, and deny thee, and say 'Who is the Lord?' or lest I be poor and steal, and profane the name of my God." [Proverbs 30:8-9]

It seems important to know what tempts us. And it seems important to know God's word. Then we might be able to choose between our cravings or our living to respect, love, trust and serve God.

If you are not part of another person's life, or you don't like them for personal reasons, then you don't really care about what they have to offer. You don't care because they are futuristic, they are not part of the norm, they are not what you want them to be, you can't be "objective" to the person because you take what they've done in the past personally. We should realize the real problem is public education. Most of the city of Nome has lost sight of the real objective- how are we going to educate our students to the best of our ability. Instead, most people of Nome are banging heads with each other with what seems like "vindictive" personal issues. If the people of Nome voted on who their school board members would be, don't you think that they trust them to do the right thing? Obviously that is not the case if a town meeting is being held on why the school board is trying to get rid of certain people who are all about the education of your children. From my viewpoint, some of the school board members have a personal issue with who is to educate their children. In a perfect objective world, the school board would look at credentials of the people who are teaching the kids. They wouldn't look at things like, "oh, they used to be my high school teacher, and I didn't' like them," or "they never went to my church, so I don't believe they should be part of events within the public education, and many people of Nome seem to have lost track of that

Has anyone really questioned the entire school board's framework, or what their standards are supposed to be for the community? It almost seems like you took a person who, "oh, they have a degree, they've been part of the community since they were a kid, they came back to give back to the community." OK, all those things are fine and dandy, but what is every school board member's conduct of ethics? How does each and every one of your school board members plan to positively affect Nome students' educational lives? Do you, as a member of the community, know the commitment of each and every one of your school members? Do the school board members really understand what the term "public servant" means, and what does that word mean to them? A public servant, in case some of you don't know is: A branch of governmental service in which individuals are employed on the basis of professional merit as proven by competitive examinations. All this can bring up the question of, "just how competitive was it to gain a seat on the school board?" How much did the school board members really have to compete to gain your vote?

I would think that anyone who wants to run for any kind of board, who wants to be a public servant, should be altruistic. What does altruism mean? It's an ethical doctrine that holds individuals to a moral obligation to help, serve, or benefit others, if necessary at the sacrifice of self-interest. The main point of the definition of altruism is, at the sacrifice of self-interest. If reasons of objectivity have to be kept a "secret," if issues cannot be resolved in front of the community, and members want to keep things behind closed doors with no rhyme or reason, then wouldn't you be just a little bit skeptical about the "self-interest" of someone?

Based on what I have read and heard, I whole-heartedly tried to give the best opinion I could on what is going on with the school board and the community. Things like this go on not only in Nome, but also all over the United States, and a lot of my opinion is based on things that I have researched, that happen to be facts. One thing that I would like to do is provide a link to an article about school boards, it is very interesting, extremely informative, and exactly what is happening to schools districts all around the nation.

Dear Editor:

I, like many community members have my own opinions regarding not renewing the contracts for Janeen Sullivan and Doug Boyer. I've attended the last two board meetings and have heard from all sides regarding this decision and after witnessing the craziest outburst I've ever seen a professional grown man engage in I felt compelled to write this letter to the editor. After seeing this it made it clear in my eyes that when a certain group of people don't get their way they engage in acts like these - they write nasty letters, they speak up at meetings, they shout RECALL and act like the world is crashing in on them. These same people are college educated professionals, have high achieving students in the Nome Public Schools system, are actively involved in our district, and have great lucrative employment in our community. Well, unfortunately they represent a small percentage of the parents who have kids out at the school- they represent a small percentage but they are the most vocal. What about the kids who have parents that are not educated, that aren't involved in the education of their children or who are struggling to make ends meet? These are the kids that need the help the most, the disadvantaged portion of our children who as of right now are falling through the cracks of our educational system. When do we put these kids first? The kids who don't have support systems at homewho don't have parents that asks them about homework or even care if they finish school. These kids need the most guidance and I truly feel these are the kids whose voices need to be heard.

I know we don't live in a perfect utopian world and that no matter how hard we try there will always be a portion of kids who drop out or who don't care enough to finish school. But I also know that we as a school and as a community can rally together and do our best to help these kids. I feel like the current administration is not doing their best. I know when I was in high school the kids I saw in the counselors office were mostly the kids that didn't need the counseling. There was a select group of kids in there everyday to just visit and talk, but what about those kids who actually needed the counseling? My senior year was a very hard year for me, I was dealing with numerous things at home. During that time, I went from being a semester away from National Honors Society to failing 2 classes my first semester. Never once did ANY counselor pull me aside and offer guidance! How many other students are facing these same issues? The only reason I graduated was because of my teachers and because of my own realization that no matter how hard life was; I needed to pull it together. Unfortunately many students in this situation feel like their only option is to drop out.

Another comment I keep hearing is how our students are going to suffer because of this decision. Well, I was one of those students who went through many, many different administrators, I couldn't even tell you the names of my principals or vice principals. The people who made the biggest impact on my education were my teachers- I could tell you the names of all my teachers. Andre was definitely the hardest, but the most willing to give up his lunch break to help with any math assignment; he by far was my best teacher. Nancy was always there to give a helping hand and to talk. Karen made learning fun and was also a great support system. My point being, our students spend the most time during their days with teachers. If we have a great teaching staff that is dedicated to education and the students of Nome, they will continue to teach here and do the great jobs they are

An additional point I wanted to touch on was the discipline issues. Honestly, even with all our different administrators I never remembered discipline being an issue. Of course there was always that one fight that happened, or kids smoking at the bus stop. But they were handled by the administration and rarely did I ever see a police officer at the school. How many times are the police being called to the school nowadays? Is this the best solution? Having kids leave high school with lengthy rap sheets? I know that some issues require authorities to step in, but I don't believe this should be the solution in almost every situation. We shouldn't have kids dropping out of school because of one mistake or starting rap sheets that will follow them throughout their lives. The administration should focus more time building relationships with underachieving students rather than

There are always going to be decisions in all of our lives that we are not happy with. It's how you handle those decisions and move forward. I believe we need to move forward and that our school and our students will be resilient. The school board made a very difficult decision but I believe it's the best decision for our students and our community. Carmill Goldsberry liver their services during the renovation effort. In this case these state agencies would have to function in temporary locations for about two years. In our experience, the cost and inconvenience of relocating such agencies during renovation is often grossly underestimated.

Also, many state agencies operating in Nome have grown significantly over the years. Many of these agencies are currently renting space in various locations around town. Some of these spaces are poorly configured to accomplish the mission of the various agencies. In all cases the lease rates paid by these agencies are considerably more expensive than the cost of space in a state owned facility.

As a result of all these factors the State has decided that it is not in the State's best interest to pursue renovation of the existing facility.

Q. What will happen to the old state building when this project is over?

A. Because of the building's many problems, the current plan is to seek capital funding to demolish the building after a new building is put in service. Following demolition the state plans to sell the real estate to defray the cost of demolition.

Q. What state agencies would be located in the new facility and how big will it be?

A. Its too early to say for sure but nearly all state agencies with a presence in Nome have expressed a serious desire to be located in the new facility. Over the last 8 months or so we've conducted programming meetings to get a grasp of each agencies function and space needs and also which other agencies they would like to be located near or in some cases not near each other. Following these programming sessions the architect reviewed the data and came up with a draft concept floor plan. If all interested agencies are located in the new facility it will need to be approximately 60,000 square ft. By comparison this is approximately the same size as the Nome Elementary School. About 165 people would work in this building.

The final size of the building will be determined by the amount of funding the legislature actually decides to appropriate for the project. This year the Department of Transportation requested funds for construction, however this request did not make it into the governor's budget for FY 2011. I've been told it is currently showing on the spending plan for FY 2012. If not enough funding is appropriated to construct the full scale plan the plan will need to be downsized and some agencies will not relocate to the new building.

Q. Why are you looking at moving off of Front Street?

A. All of the available sites on Front Street are just too small to accommodate a structure of this size. The largest contiguous block of vacant land is Block C Lots 1-4 (the vacant lot next to the old Federal Building). According to the City of Nome's tax records, the total area of these four lots is about 27,000 square feet. We feel that about the biggest building we could situate there would be something similar in size to the old federal building. The old federal building is three floors and about 32,000 total square feet. Obviously this leaves a large gap to fill.

Parking and access on Front Street is problematic as well. Architects generally recommend allowing for off-street parking of one space for every 300 square feet of building. For a 60,000 sq foot building that converts to 200 spaces. This allows for parking for each of the 165 employees as well as additional parking for state vehicles and the public. A typical parking space is about 8' X 20'. That adds up to about 32,000 square feet, just for parking. In addition to the parking space there is a need for vehicle and pedestrian access routes, fire clear zones

Location on the ground floor is also an issue. Many of the agencies have expressed and demonstrated a legitimate reason for needing a ground floor location. Constructing a small footprint multi floor building will create problems for those agencies and the public. For these reasons the architect is currently recommending a maximum two floor structure of about 30,000 square feet on each floor.

Another factor that should be kept in mind when selecting a site, is an allowance for future growth. This is often overlooked or minimized at this stage of a project, but when it is, problems come up later on. As western

Alaska continues to grow, so will the state agencies that will occupy the building. The court system is already talking about the possible need for a second court room, and other agencies project growth as well. It's also likely that agencies like Fish and Game, DOT and the State Troopers would at some point in the future want to have cold storage or just open storage space on the site for vehicles or equipment. This isn't an option if the site is constrained as it would be on Front Street.

Adding everything together we've come up with a minimum lot size of about 90,000 square feet (slightly more than 2 acres) not allowing for future growth. Roughly three times the size of anything on Front Street. If you add on an allowance for future growth and buffers, a four acre site is really a better size.

Q. Why not accomplish these goals by building more than one building?

A. The main reason for a one building plan is cost efficiency. It's well documented that building and maintaining one large building is considerably less expensive than building and maintaining two or more smaller buildings. Maintenance and operating budgets are very tight and all agencies are under constant pressure to maintain or grow the level of service they provide and at the same time reduce costs. One way to accomplish that is by setting up facilities that are well planned and can operate efficiently.

There would have to be a real compelling reason not to consolidate in order to look seriously at that option. Unfortunately preservation of Front Street just doesn't meet that test on the state wide level.

Q. How did the Steadman Street site become the preferred location?

A. Over a year ago Northern Region M&O Staff and I meet with Mayor Banke and other city staff to discuss possible locations for the project. After looking at the available Front street locations and finding that they were not really large enough, we looked at maps of the area and identified Steadman Street and two sites along the bypass road as potentially workable sites. The Steadman Site was selected as the preferred location because of it is the closest site to the city center. Zoning there is "General Use" and while some residences are adjacent to the site, other public and private institutional buildings (Alaska Gold Shop, NSRHC, Nome Eskimo, the Rec Center) are located in the area. In addition the City has plans to extend Steadman Street out to the bypass road so that access to the new public safety building and the hospital will improve.

The City of Nome was informed promptly and until recently, the State received no negative comments back on the site selection. Last fall the city passed a resolution supporting this project and included materials in its legislative priorities package clearly showing the new State Office Building at the Stedman Street location and using this to help support the City's request for funding to extend Steadman. Thinking the City Council was supportive of this site; we've moved ahead with preliminary environmental work on the site and have now negotiated terms for purchase agreement with Alaska Gold for the purchase.

Q. What will happen now?

A. That depends on what the Nome City Council decides to do. The Steadman street site requires replatting prior to sale. As a part of this process the city of Nome will need to vacate a portion of the 6th Avenue ROW. The result of this action will be a single contiguous parcel of about 4.3 acres that Alaska Gold has agreed to sell to the state.

If the City decides not to vacate the 6th Avenue ROW, then the deal for the Steadman Street site falls through. Should this happen, the Bypass road sites would become the next most desirable sites from the State's perspective, and the State plans to move in that direction.

Q. What can the people of Nome do to keep state offices on Front Street?

A. As I've explained above, the decision to move away from Front Street is based primarily on economics, the risk of flood damage and the lack of a contiguous space large enough to accommodate the need. If the City wants the state to reconsider its decision it will need to find a meaningful way to change some or all of these dynamics. How that could be accomplished is really a question for the City Council to answer.

Foundation and informed the SNC Shareholders that a network of scholarship programs (S.P.A.N.S.) had been formed with others entities. This network includes Sitnasuak Foundation, Bering Straits Foundation, Nome Eskimo Community, Kawerak, Norton Sound Economic Development Corporation, and Norton Sound Health Corporation.

Ms. Timbers spoke about eligibility requirements along with the compensation for students' programs then asked if there were any questions. I thought the eligibility requirements affected shareholders who lived outside the region negatively. I asked if students didn't plan on returning to the region would it mean they are ineligible for any of the scholarships. She responded that was right. I said, "So that means all these people here at the meeting would not be eligible for scholarships if they don't return to the region." She replied that was correct and I said that was wrong (the policy was wrong). Then I asked her where the funding for the scholarships was coming from. Kirsten replied that all the funding was coming from Native corporations. I do understand there is an Arts Auction and small donations from individuals that do provide some money for the scholarship funds. Before the end of the meeting Trudy Sobocienski stated that scholarships were one of the things SNC would be working on. Mrs. Sobocienski mentioned scholarships in a letter to SNC Shareholders, which was sent out just before the SNC suits and counter-suits article came out in your newspaper.

I can understand why NSHC, NSEDC, and maybe Kawerak would maintain the S.P.A.N.S. policy. I don't agree with SF, BSF, and NEC helping to promote this policy by action or inaction. What this policy does is provide extra funding for certain students while disqualifying all the students outside the region or possibly students within the region who do not plan on returning after graduation (ostensibly to look for work).

I have lived in Anchorage for over 30 years and I moved here for economic reason, jobs. That is the major reason most people leave rural Alaska to live in areas like Anchorage and Fairbanks not to mention the Lower 48. Anchorage and Fairbanks are distribution hubs for goods bound for rural Alaska. Having educated people working jobs in these cities indirectly benefits rural Alaskans. I have seen people sending their relatives or friends items by mail or cargo practically every time I am at the post office or cargo Sitnasuak and Bering Straits Foundations receive funding from the for-profit corporations of SNC and BSNC. SF has one director from SNC Board of Directors on its board. BSF has two directors from BSNC Board of Directors on its board, one who lives out of state. The shareholders' money is used to fund these foundations. In my opinion, a large number of SNC and BSNC shareholders are being openly discriminated against where scholarships are concerned.

Approximately 55-60 percent of SNC Shareholders live outside of the region. According to Bering Straits Regional Corporation there are 5,602 BSNC Shareholders of which 2,327 live inside the region. In Alaska there are 2,009 BSNC shareholders that live outside the region and 1,276 shareholders that live in the Lower 48 States. That means there are a total of 3,285 BSNC shareholders that live outside the BSNC region, which is 58.64 percent of the total BSNC shareholders. Those are majorities of shareholders who do not qualify for BSF and SF scholarships.

I am an original shareholder in both Native corporations and am on the enrollment list at NEC as I am sure practically all the original shareholders of SNC and shareholders who have a percentage of original shares through gifting or inheritance are. That means that there is a huge number of NEC enrollees living outside of Nome. Especially when so many SNC shareholders live outside the region. I have my NEC Tribal Enrollment Verification Card with my picture on it signed by Linda Kimoktoak. NEC uses the enrollment number to secure money from the United States government for their programs. Why are they promoting the policy of the S.P.A.N.S. consolidated scholarships policy? I think SF, BSF, and NEC should withdraw from the S.P.A.N.S. Network, administrate their own scholarship programs, and not exclude members outside the region from being qualified scholarship applications.

Excluding SNC and BSNC shareholders and NEC members who live outside the region from being qualified scholarship applicants is irrational and unconscionable in my opinion. The board members of SNC and BSNC Foundations and NEC should take the time to re-examine their traditional values, recover their identities, and then do what is right.

Thank you very much, Editor, for allowing me to voice my concerns and opinions in your newspaper. Sincerely,

Larry L. Keller (Amaq) 3705 Arctic Blvd. #1151 Anchorage, AK 99503 Note: Director 12 years SNC BOD, director 3-4 years SF 2-3 years treasurer

I spent most of the first week of February at the NSEDC quarterly board meeting, or more accurately, locked out of the meeting while the board dealt with whatever it is they deal with behind closed doors during their interminable executive sessions. NSEDC abuses executive sessions more than any organization I have ever been involved with. The public's business should be conducted in public not behind closed doors, in secret, the way NSEDC does it.

In a letter to the editor in last week's Nugget, NSEDC President Dan Harrelson wrote. "We understand that writing accurate stories about discussions held in executive session is difficult. However, due to the proprietary nature of certain business and corporate matters, we will continue to hold certain discussions in executive session."

NSEDC is a non profit corporation exempt from income taxation. Tax exemption is a privilege granted by the taxpayers to organizations that provide benefits to the public that business corporations would not do. The section of the IRS code that exempts NSEDC from paying income tax characterizes qualified exempt organizations as, "not organized for profit but operated exclusively for the promotion of social welfare..." NSEDC is not supposed to be in business and the matters Harrelson thinks need to be kept secret could lead to NSEDC being found in violation of the tax code. They've already had to pay $12.4 million in back taxes, penalties and interest and that should have been a clue that their understanding of the laws governing tax exempt organizations is flawed but evidentially it wasn't.

Last week, as with previous NSEDC board meetings, most of the agenda was devoted to talk about NSEDC's for-profit, industrial commercial fishing ventures and very little time was spent on what, according to the IRS code, should be NSEDC's exclusive focus; developing the economies of 15 Norton Sound communities.

One exception in a wasted week, however, is worthy of note. During a rare open portion of the meeting, Joe Garnie introduced a motion to move the NSEDC headquarters back to Norton Sound. NSEDC spends between $3 and $4 million per year on administration in Anchorage. The impact on our local economy from having that amount of money spent here is obvious. During this time when the cost of living is going through the roof and revenues are way down, why wouldn't we want to keep that money here instead of spending it in Anchorage? No one could think of a good reason. A couple of board members said they couldn't vote yes on Garnie's motion because they didn't know how much it would cost to move the office. I pointed out that a few years back, NSEDC had contracted with an economist to estimate the cost of moving the office to Norton Sound and he had written a detailed report complete with comprehensive cost estimates but apparently that wasn't good enough. Eventually, the question was called and in a roll call vote, 13 of the 15 directors voted against moving the NSEDC headquarters office to Norton Sound period. The motion was not to move it by a specific date or which parts of it to move, it was a vote to move it home or to keep it permanently in Anchorage, and they voted it down. The only ones to vote in favor of returning it to our region were Joe Garnie and Reggie Barr. Among the hardest to understand was the vote against the move by Frank Katchatag from Unalakleet. He had recently gathered signatures on a petition to move the office back to the region and presented it to the board who failed to act on it. In the interim Frank must have had a dramatic change of heart because this time he didn't say a word in favor of moving out of Anchorage and went with the majority. As the man said, "There are strange things done in the midnight sun.'

Nome's only representative, Don Stiles, voted against the move even though Nome would be the most logical choice for the office location and Nome businesses and the City of Nome would benefit from the influx of millions of dollars of new money in the form of wages spent by the office workers and the economic opportunities associated with supplying all of the things needed to operate a new large enterprise in our town.

We will probably never know why the board voted the way they did, they aren't very good about explaining why they do things but anyone who cares anything about the economy of our 15 communities might want to take this action into account when they go to the polls. Any NSEDC director who voted against Norton Sound on this question should be voted off the NSEDC board at the earliest opportunity.

In the meantime, while you are waiting for the next election, why not ask your NSEDC representative why they voted against moving the headquarters back to the region. Elected representatives really are supposed to answer questions like that. Aren't they? Tim Smith

Iron Dog crowns two new champs

By Tyler Rhodes

Facing a course that chewed up and spit out more than half of the 29 teams that entered the 2010 Iron Dog snowmachine race, the competitors who made it to the finish line in Fairbanks this year were likely just happy to have survived the trail.

On Saturday in Fairbanks, Tyler Huntington and Chris Olds were definitely happy, having not only survived, but thrived on the rollicking route that led each of them to their first Iron Dog win. Both riders raced Polaris IQ 600s this year with a total trail time of 41 hours, four minutes and nine seconds for the 2,000-mile race from Big Lake to Nome and on to Fairbanks.

If Olds and Huntington were looking back on that final run to Fairbanks, there was nothing—or, at least, no one—to see. The duo finished just shy of noon nearly an hour before secondplace finishers Doug Dixon and Stephen Spence would cross the line. When all the staggered start times were accounted for, Huntington and Olds won by more than 2 1/2 hours.

While the winning duo were well ahead of this year's competition, they were more than four hours off last year's record finish by Todd Minnick and Nick Olstad in 37:19:18.

This was Olds's ninth Iron Dog, with his previous best finish coming in 2007 when he finished fourth with Matthew Spernak of Anchorage. Olds lives in Eagle River. Huntington, who is originally from Galena and now lives in Fairbanks, was racing his fourth Iron Dog this year. He finished third in 2008 with Koyukuk's Pete Demoski and fifth last year with Nome's Mike Morgan.

Huntington and Olds grabbed the lead on the way to Nome in Kaltag after last year's champs, Minnick and Olstad, were forced to stop to work on their machines. Not even halfway into the race, that moment marked the last time Huntington and Olds would have another team in front of them.

Unfortunately for Minnick and Olstad, it wasn't the last time they would be forced to stop and wrench on their Polaris Rush 600s. The race for last year's victors ended in Manley, fewer than 70 miles from the finish line, after machine troubles plagued them much of the way.

Most of the teams who toed the line at the Iron Dog start on Big Lake Feb. 21 didn't make it even that far. The first few hundred miles of trail dealt the riders a veritable grab bag of conditions—deep snow, slush,

Subsistence users want voice in northern Bering Sea research plan

Sit down and talk with us, villagers tell NMFS scientists

By Laurie McNicholas

Representatives of communities in the Northern Bering Sea Research Area (which includes Norton Sound) insisted that National Marine Fisheries Service scientists need to work closely with them to develop an adequate research plan for the area at a community and subsistence workshop held Feb. 24-25 in Anchorage.

Tribal members and other community delegates cited examples of diminishing fish and walrus resources and other changes observed in the northern Bering Sea in recent decades. They said they had attempted without success to interest state and federal fisheries researchers and managers in their concerns. They expressed fears that a northern Bering Sea bottom trawl survey scheduled for August of this year and designed by NMFS scientists without input from the area's subsistence users could damage the ecosystem and further deplete their subsistence resources. In June 2007 the North Pacific Management Council adopted a recommendation to create the NBSRA and close it to fishing with bottom trawl gear until the council develops a plan for managing fishing in the area that includes appropriate protection measures. Little bottom trawling has taken place in the area, and evidence indicates that yellowfin sole and other flatfish targeted by bottom trawlers are moving into northern waters as a result of climate change. The council asked that a research plan be developed for its review within two years of the implementation date.

The council's action also created four habitat conservation areas, including one around St.

Council sets cost guidelines for renovating bowling alley

By Laurie McNicholas

Four members of the Nome Common Council discussed ideas for renovating the Recreation Center's bowling alley during a work session with staff at the facility, city administrators and a few interested citizens on Monday.

On the Web:

www.nomenugget.net E-mail:

nugget@nomenugget.com

The questions they considered were: (1) Should the City open and operate the bowling alley? Should the operation be outsourced to a local business? What is the best use of the remaining $742,000 in grant funds for the Recreation Center?

Councilwoman Mary Knodel said she does not want to put money into what failed at the Recreation Center and at the Mini Convention Center. She suggested putting a little money into making the bowling alley operational. Noting that a proposal suggests a salary of $50,000 for a bowling alley operator, she said the City pays some of its managers that amount. She said that one person could manage both the bowling alley and a restaurant with one cook.

Council members agreed not to install an automated scoring system or gutter bumpers at the facility. They estimated that the bowling alley would operate eight or nine months a year and not in summer months.

Paul Kosto said he had drafted a proposal and cost estimates to get the bowling alley project going. Noting an announcement by a group that wants to raise money for Nome-Beltz High School events, he suggested that volunteers may operate a restaurant at the bowling alley over a nine-month period to raise funds.

Councilmen Stan Andersen and Randy Pomeranz expressed doubt that volunteers would consistently and effectively operate a restaurant. Anderson said parents lose interest in such activities when their kids graduate. Pomeranz said the same dozen parents do all the fundraising work and burn out.

Recreation Center Director Chip

Leeper said he had surveyed bowling alleys in Alaska and learned their average charges range from more than $3 to more than $4, about half the amount the proposal uses to estimate operating revenues for the Nome facility.

City Manager Josie Bahnke noted that involvement in reviving bowling has dwindled from 25 to 30 Nomeites to few persons other than council members and city employees. She pointed out that the Recreation Center is an old facility with deferred maintenance needs for which a total of $742,000 in remaining grant funds could be used. "The south entrance roof is an issue," she said. "It should be fixed or potentially we will not have an entrance. We could look at boiler replacement.

Letters -

Dear Nancy,

I think the current state of transportation for Nome should remain as it is. That is, NO ROADS LEAD TO NOME. This is in reference to the front-page article of the February 4 Nome Nugget and other previous articles on the topic.

No matter who might pay, no road should be built to connect the main Alaska road infrastructure to Nome. Sure the road could possibly generate economic benefits, jobs, valuable minerals to export out of Alaska, etc. However, Bush Alaska should not suffer this "improvement." Bush Alaska is a rare resource to the world. Its relatively undeveloped state should be left without any such road. Leave this region, environment, society, and culture as it is. It has been doing well for some long time. A road to Nome would detract hugely from the psychological and real sense that Nome and its surrounding villages are out on the edge of the earth. Such a road would detract immensely from the social-psychological identity of Nome and its surrounding villages and all communities the road would connect. The Iditarod Trail, barges, and air transport are good enough.

It was a fantastic scene in the mind's eye. It's so similar to the events

If economic and political pressures are such that it should be built, it should not be from public revenues of the State of Alaska, federal government, or any other public funds. Private sector mining and other interests should finance it from their collective pockets.

On the other hand, the State of Alaska and Federal entities (such as the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers) should draft plans and construct improved marine port facilities in Nome. Authorities should construct a much deeper port by extending the existing port causeway to deeper water. Also they should expand the docking facilities. This would serve the marine traffic that is already increasing at an exponential rate in recent years and is destined to increase at a high rate in coming decades. Focus public funds on the port but not the road. This can help accommodate economic development and jobs without the deleterious effects of the road.

I urge elected officials at all levels to consider my sentiments on these two issues. These include Mayor Michels, State Representative Foster, State Senator Olson, U.S. Representative Young, U.S. Senator Murkowski, and U.S. Senator Be-

Some may still remember that I lived in Nome from 1981 to 1988. I was a Coastal Zone Management planner for five of those years and director of the Northern Lights Recovery Center my last year. I met a young lady named Sue Smelser who was working as a missionary volunteer for KICY Radio. We got married and it's now 27 years later. Sue and I deeply cherish the treasure of experience that Nome is.

Nancy and all of the fine writers and photographers at the splendid Nome Nugget, please keep up all the good work. For all of us, who lived in Nome but moved on for various reasons, the Nome Nugget helps us keep our tie to the place where our heart lies.

Dear Editor:

A Sad Sign of the Times What is a School's Purpose?

For decades the breakdown of the American family has put increasing pressure on our nation's school districts to solve the challenges created by parents who for whatever reason

- Failed to instill in their children a desire to learn and excel in school.
- Failed to teach their children to follow school rules
- · Failed to properly prepare their children for school; i.e., well fed, rested, and ready to learn.
- · Failed to be actively involved in their child's education.

These are all required for kids to do well academically.

More American parents are taking less responsibility for raising kids to become productive members of society. The number of dysfunctional families is increasing as well as the number of broken homes. These trends have had disastrous consequences for our kids and our country's future.

Schools were never intended to handle or fix the types of problems that kids are bringing into the classrooms. Schools were never designed to deal with or fix the effects of dysfunctional families and broken homes. Expecting schools to accept this responsibility is like asking the fine folks working at Nome Liquor to rebuild an airplane motor, even though they have no training to do

None the less, well meaning school boards (like the Nome board) have been assigning this responsibility to school administrators. The administrators then transfer this responsibility to their already overburdened teachers and staff, requiring them to take on roles in which they have no training. When the community observes teachers attempting to fulfill this directive from school administrators, regardless of how improper or ridiculous, the public perception becomes that this task is indeed a legitimate responsibility of the school district.

The primary responsibilities of schools are to provide a safe learning environment for all who enter its doors, and to provide the skills necessary for every subject taught. Every school has created rules so these two goals are achieved.

If the kids can't follow the rules, the solution is neither to terminate the administrators who enforce the rules, nor to allow the unacceptable behavior to continue.

It is not the school district's fault that some kids come to school and refuse to follow the rules, be interested, or properly prepared to learn; it's the parents'! Unfortunately, it has become acceptable to publicly blame schools for poor student behavior. Our school board, like so many others across the country, is assigning the responsibility of parenting issues onto the school administrators. It is more comfortable for school boards to blame the school rather than holding parents accountable.

If the major problem facing our nation's schools has to do with poor parenting, what advantages does Nome have over the rest of the coun-

In our region, we have many groups that can create partnerships with Nome-Beltz to identify at-risk kids, and provide early intervention so these kids can arrive at school with the right mindset.

I believe the school board's decision not to renew the administrator's employment contracts has more to do with blaming the school for parental issues, instead of the socalled "confidential personnel is-

Ultimately, it is parents, not the school, who should be held accountable for kids who fail to do well in school, fail to follow rules, and fail

Dear Editor:

To: Nome School Board Members,

It has just come to my attention at your meeting last night that the current administrators at Beltz are not being considered for hire to those principal positions. This is unjust and morally outrageous. Please be sure to instruct and empower Superintendent Wehde to consider their applications fully, and if they are qualified, to interview them. Let the hiring committee do their job. There will be very few in the community who will believe that Mrs. Sullivan and Mr. Boyer are not qualified, even among those who do not support them. To deny them consideration because you have prejudged them sounds illegal and is surely patently unfair. Please put this on your March 9 agenda and take action on this if it is not possible to do it sooner.

Again, as I stated in my 2/10/10 email to those of you who declined to take action to resolve the current situation at your meeting two weeks ago, "For the good of our community, our schools, and especially our youth, please resign now. It will save both you and us much grief. It will allow us to resume our focus on our mission. It is the honorable thing to do." I respect each of you as individuals, but I no longer have confidence in you.

Thank you for your service, Lloyd Perrigo Nome, AK

Dear Nancy,

Thank you for printing a different opinion on the school board controversy. I think Carmelle did a good job of describing problems at NBHS.

Since the school board members are under such strict legalities on what they can and can not say, much of the public has been baffled by their decision. Carmelle gave the public an opinion that is actually very widespread among people who do not speak out much.

I have had three kids graduate from NBHS and agree 100 percent with Carmelle Goldsberry 's letter.

With all due respect to differences of opinion, thank you for your service to the community.

Court denies Nomeite's request to halt Pilgrim sale

By Diana Haecker

Nomeite Louie Green last Friday requested a stay on the sale of Pilgrim Hot Springs at the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Anchorage, but the judge denied the request.

Louie and Nancy Green had filed a request with the Superior Court in Nome for quiet title of Pilgrim Hot Springs. The Greens have seasonally lived at the hot springs since 1975, according to paralegal Karlin Itchoak with Green's lawyer Bryon Collins.

The sale of Pilgrim Hot Springs is part of the Catholic Bishop of Northern Alaska's bankruptcy plan. The diocese had filed for bankruptcy when hundreds of civil lawsuits were filed, claiming clergy sexual abuse. In order to come up with the cash to settle these cases, CBNA filed for bankruptcy protection. The hot springs, located about 60 miles north of Nome and hailed for its geothermal energy potential, are part of CBNA's bankruptcy plan. However, Louie and Nancy Green objected to the sale, claiming quiet title to the property.

In the hearing on Friday, Green requested a stay of the sale of the hot springs pending the outcome of his appeal to the United States District Court. The appeal is to have his quiet title case heard in State Superior Court, and his lawyers are hoping for a trial in Nome to settle who really owns Pilgrim Hot Spring—CBNA or the Greens. Green's lawyer argues that the Greens own Pilgrim by adverse possession, and that CBNA cannot sell something it does not own. Adverse possession is a principle of real estate law where somebody who possesses the land of another for an extended period of time may be able to claim legal title to that land.

The deadline to submit bids for the sale of Pilgrim Hot Springs as part of the Catholic Bishop of Northern Alaska's bankruptcy plan was last Feb. 25. On March 5, the sealed bids will be opened and a bankruptcy judge is going to conduct the bidding. The bids open at $1.85 million, but the diocese banked on getting bids closer to $2 million. If no bids higher than the opening bid are received, the endowment fund of CBNA would then become the owner free and clear of any claims.

Jury convicts Elim man on felony importation charge

A jury in Nome last week found the ringleader of a bootlegging scheme gone awry guilty of felony alcohol importation.

Following a two-day trial, the jury handed down a guilty verdict for Timothy L. Moore, 40, of Elim onFeb. 24. Moore is scheduled to be sentenced sometime this month.

The trial and verdict stem from an incident in August that involved boats, four-wheelers, washed-up booze bottles, a pursuit by Alaska State Troopers and an eventual rescue at sea by a good Samaritan vessel and the U.S. Coast Guard.

Moore and his nephew, Martin Saccheus, 25, had left Elim in late August by boat to go to Nome. Loaded on the boat was a fourwheeler and trailer, which they used once they landed at the Solomon River, roughly 35 miles from Nome.

According to testimony in the case given by Saccheus and another man who participated in the scheme, Wayne Moses, the four-wheeler and trailer were used to travel to Nome. get a large load of booze and then shuttle it back to the waiting boat. The trio purchased more than $1,000 worth of alcohol, mostly hard liquor, at Polaris Liquor, loaded it into the trailer and motored off to the boat.

Saccheus and Moore set off for Elim in the boat in the early morning hours of Aug. 25 while Moses rode the four-wheeler back to Nome. Sometime during the trip back, the prop spun off the boat's motor, leaving Moore and Saccheus to drift in the Bering Sea with their payload that Saccheus testified sells for $120 a bottle in Elim.

All the while, Alaska State Trooper Jay Sears had been on the lookout for the two men after receiving an anonymous tip of their activities. Sears was seemingly always one step behind as he searched along the later on the sea after flying to Golovin. Once the duo lost their prop, others joined in the search after the duo called for help via a VHF radio.

Ultimately a Coast Guard C-130 Hercules aircraft was used to locate the stranded boat from above by use of radio signals. It was able to direct a good Samaritan vessel, the FV SKJ, to the boat, which towed it and the two men to port in Golovin in the early morning hours of Aug. 26. Saccheus testified that before receiving the tow, however, he began throwing out the liquor in order to avoid trouble. Within a day or two, the bottles began washing up near Golovin.

Once the duo arrived in Golovin, Trooper Sears was there to meet them. Moore had contended that he was bound for his camp outside of Elim where the local ban on alcohol did not apply.

Moore's was the second conviction in the matter. Saccheus, 25, pleaded guilty Nov. 20 to one misdemeanor charge of importing alcohol in exchange for the dropping of two related felony charges before Magistrate Bradley Gater in Nome. As part of a plea agreement, Saccheus testified for the state in its case against Moore.

Moses's testimony also came as a result of a deal that allowed his charges to be dropped. Moses was facing potential felony charges of transporting a large amount of alcohol to a dry community.

A status hearing is slated for Moore for March 4 at 8:30 a.m. at the Nome Courthouse.

Windshield stolen after vehicle rollover

Shortly after midnight Sunday morning a Ford pick-up rolled off the Beltz Highway in the northbound lane near City Field. The driver, Chris Erickson, 16, reported the accident to Nome Police. Nome Volunteer Ambulance and Fire Department responded in the -30°F cold. The driver and his lone passenger, Cara Bouie, 20, were transported to Norton Sound Hospital for evaluation. Nome Police report that neither had significant injuries.

The next morning it was discovered that the windshield was removed from the scene by person or persons unknown. Anyone having the windshield or any information about the removal of the windshield from the scene is asked to return the windshield to the Erickson home or the Nome Police Department.

Temperatures in Nome dip to the coldest in a decade

For all those who said, "It hasn't been this cold in years," last weekend, you were right.

According to the National Weather Service Office, Saturday morning's temperature of -35°F was the lowest the mercury has dropped in more than a decade in Nome. The last time Nome saw -35°F was Jan. 30, 2000. The last time Nome registered a colder temperature than that was Feb. 7, 1999 when the low hit -38°F.

Cold as it was Saturday, it wasn't the record for the date. That dubious achievement dates back to Feb. 27, 1971 when it hit -40°F. The coldest high temperature for the date was set Feb. 27, 1990 when the thermometer only climbed to -17°F. Nome's recorded weather data spans more than a century.

While Nomeites shouldn't break out their shorts just yet, forecasts from the National Weather Service as of Monday night called for above-zero temperatures by the latter end of this week.

Bowling Alley

Relocating [the boiler] could open up room in the weight room."

Andersen suggested that the City seek proposals from private entities to run the bowling alley and restaurant. Knodel agreed but said space is available for a snack bar, not a restaurant. Leeper weighed in against serving beer or wine at the facility, because the Recreation Center emphasizes healthy activities and is used by children.

Kosto asked if the council wants to put the city-owned bowling alley in private hands. Pomeranz said it's no different than having the snack bar privately operated. Leeper said his survey had found no bowling alleys in Alaska operated by public entities other than those run by the military.

Andersen asked Leeper to find out what parts are needed to make bowling alley machines operational and to check out information that a military base has modernized its bowling alley equipment and is offering free spare parts from older equipment. Andersen said adult bowling leagues are essential to the success of a bowling alley, and he asked Leeper to determine whether groups are interested in forming them.

Andersen and Pomeranz said they support a bowling alley as a recreational alternative for the community. Pomeranz estimated renovation costs for the facility at $100,000. Andersen read comments by Councilman Jon Larson that it would be a shame to waste an asset worth $300,000 to $400,000 unless the cost of operating it drained too much of the City's finances.

Council members asked Leeper to prepare a cost estimate for the city to run the bowling alley and snack bar to compare with proposals from private sources to run either the bowling alley or snack bar or both. They also asked Bahnke to prepare a list of repairs needed in areas of the Recreation Center other than the bowling alley.

Larson and Councilman Jerald Brown were absent from the session, as was Mayor Denise Michels.

I KNOW I CAN-Volunteers Lew Tobin and Marsha Sloan, both of Nome, participate in the I Know I Can program in Matt Slingsby's 2nd

What do I want to be?

I Know I Can promotes thoughts of careers

By Kacey Miller

College alumni and other volunteers in Nome, Unalakleet and Shishmaref visited local second grade classrooms last week to share about dreaming big. In its fourth consecutive year, the "I Know I Can" program has been offering children in larger school sites around Alaska opportunities to start thinking about their future.

Upon hearing of the program at other locations, UAF-Northwest Campus Regional Education Coordinator Kacey Miller took interest and requested to coordinate and expand the program to schools in the Bering Strait Region. Statewide event coordinators approved Miller's request, adding Nome, Shishmaref and Unalakleet as three new "I Know I Can" sites to the program.

Denise Thoreson's second grade class in Shishmaref hosted the region's first "I Know I Can" event on February 17. Nome's Mari Lammer, Colleen Johnson and Matt Slingsby's classes had their second events on February 25 and 26. In Unalakleet second grade teacher Shelley Herzing and Northwest Campus Education Coordinator Reese Huhta have scheduled the final "I Know I Can" event for Friday, March 5. Together these events involve 81 second grade students in addition to nine local community volunteers.

The "I Know I Can" book features animal characters who prompt children to start thinking about career choices. Volunteers share their own personal experiences of college and postsecondary training. Through reading of the book and class discussions, the children are encouraged to work hard, stay in school and think about education and training after they graduate from high school.

The book follows a class of animal characters thinking about what they want to be when they grow up. A little mouse character donning a cap and gown hides on each page, thinking "I Know I Can" to himself as the story unfolds. The teacher, Mrs. Walker, explains to the children that they should start thinking about their futures now, and she gives them lots of ideas, such as being a house builder, farmer, doctor or nurse. "You can become whatever you want if you try," Mrs. Walker says. She even gains the acceptance of one reluctant character O'Toot the owl, who thinks he already knows everything.

After hearing the story, students draw a picture on a postcard showing what they want to be when they grow up. The postcard is mailed back to the students in a future year as a reminder of their goals and the event. Upon conclusion of the classroom activity, each student receives his or her own personal copy of the book to take home.

Sponsored as a UA College Savings Plan and Alaska Commission on Postsecondary Education partnership, this initiative is expanding every year. The UA College Savings Plan fully funds the project, with operational support from the ACPE. "I Know I Can" is a non-profit, national organization based in Ohio. Additional pictures of the volunteers, students' postcards and events are online at the Northwest Campus Student Blog (http://nwcstudents.blogspot.com) and also http://www.alaska.edu/studentservices/outreach/i_know_i_can. For more information on the program in our region or if you're interested in volunteering in a classroom next year, contact Kacey Miller at Northwest Campus (443-8416).

Nome competes in battle of books

By Joy HewittNome Public Schools fought hard and furiously this year in the state Battle of Books competition.

On Presidents' Day Feb. 15, when most of the students slept in on their day off, Joel Jorgensen, Cecilia Wehde. Nick Morgan and Jeffrey Rose were at school by 8:30 a.m., warming up for the battle. After months of reading books, attending practices, discussing plots and studying, they assembled in front of a speakerphone and went headto-head against 28 teams from around the state. They finished the first round in second place with 200 points, advancing to the second round for another 90 minutes of intense battle. With encouragement from Dan and Janeen Sullivan, who stayed and watched some of the action, they fought on.

In the final round, Nome dropped to eighth behind Anchorage, Mat-Su and Galena, who went on to win the championship. Junior high students Bruce Landry, Oliver Hoogendorn, Jannelle Trowbridge and Rosa Schmidt worked hard. but were eliminated in the first round. Thirty-four teams battled in the seventh/eighth grade battle, and Nome finished 18th.

The fifth/sixth grade battle on Feb. 17 fielded 44 teams from around Alaska, and Nome again rose to the occasion. After two hours of battling in the first round. Nome qualified for the second round. William Herzner, Wilson Hoogendorn, Hannah Alowa and Joshua Cannon formed a strong team. They entered round two and posted a respectable 152 points. It wasn't enough to earn the top spots, but Nome tied with Juneau for 10th place overall.

On Thursday, the third/fourth grade team of Amber Gray, Sidney Kinneen and Brayden Bahnke went up against 40 teams. They worked beautifully together, answering questions with well thought-out responses. They advanced to the second round with a strong finish in round one. Despite two well-contrived challenges. they faltered and dropped down to 15th place. It was a respectable finish, considering they were the youngest battlers in this field of competitors.

Fishery worries

Lawrence Island in which bottom trawling is prohibited. However, the council indicated that a wedge-shaped area adjacent to the St. Matthew HCA called the Modified Trawl Gear Zone might be reopened following implementation of a gear modification requirement for flatfish. The wedge reportedly contains high concentrations of yellowfin sole and low concentrations of bycatch species—species other than the kind a fishery is targeting.

The NBSRA, which extends northward from the Kuskokwim Bay area to a boundary above Little Diomede Island, was closed to bottom trawl fishing in July 2008 under Amendment 89 to the fishery management plan (FMP) for groundfish of the Bering Sea and Aleutian Islands management area.

Meanwhile, members of the flatfish industry worked with scientists from the National Marine Fisheries Service to develop bottom trawl gear with bobbins (discs) placed at intervals to lift nets 2-1/2 inches off the ocean floor. In October 2009 the council adopted a proposal for Amendment 94 to the FMP to require that all vessels targeting flatfish in the Bering Sea use elevating devices on trawl sweeps, to adjust the boundaries of the Modified Trawl Gear Zone and to allow flatfishing in the zone. The NMFS is developing regulations for Amendment 94 for approval by the U.S. Secretary of Commerce.

Subsistence users comment

Dr. Cynthia Yeung of the NMFS Alaska Fisheries Science Center is project leader for the NBSRA research plan. She organized an agenda spanning one and a half days, about one-third of which was devoted to presentations by scientists from the AFSC and other units of the NMFS who do research on crabs, ice-associated seals, walrus and seabirds in the northern Bering Sea and who work on trawl survey design, fishing gear modifications and trawl impact studies. NMFS researcher Dr. Pat Livingston also participated in the workshop. She chairs the NPFMC's Science and Statistical Committee.

The rest of the agenda called for input by community members describing their communities, subsistence activities and ecological observations, and their concerns about bottom trawling impacts, research priorities, communication and outreach, cooperation in research and management and the schedule for the NBSRA research plan.

Heather Kinzie, consultant/facilitator for the workshop, encouraged questions and free-flowing commentary following each presentation, rather than delaying discussion until all of the scientists had described their activities, and workshop participants took full advantage of that format.

The workshop began with a review of the council's decision to open the Modified Trawl Gear Zone by Melanie Brown of NMFS. Yeung then outlined activities and timelines for the NBSRA research plan. She said a bottom trawl survey in the research area is slated for August 2010, a draft of the plan is due for council review in June 2011 and a final plan is due to the council in October 2011. Workshop participants spent hours discussing issues related to the two topics.

David O. David of Kwigillingok in Kuskokwim Bay has represented the Bering Sea Elders Advisory Group at NPFMC in the decision-making process for the NBSRA and the Modified Trawl Gear Zone. He said that during a council meeting in Sitka, someone had put him down by saying his people have no history in the northern Bering Sea. "We have the history providing for our people," he noted. "Please stay away from that—saying we have no history."

Several workshop participants from Bering Strait and Yukon Delta villages are newcomers to the NBRSA research plan discussions. Carl Ashenfelter of White Mountain asked who gave permission to open the Modified Trawl Gear Zone to fishing. Eric Olson, chairman of the NPFMC, said the council made the recommendation to the Secretary of Commerce and it is up to him to decide. Olson is an Alaska Native from Dillingham who works as a manager for the Yukon Delta Fisheries Development Association, one of six entities in the Western Alaska Community Development Program.

Noting that David has participated in discussions at council meetings, Olson said the council listened to concerns of the BSEAG in talks about the Modified Trawl Gear Zone. "We moved the line further west, so the council does hear," he said. "It helps when a community states its case."

Olson helped to form the council's new Rural Outreach Committee and serves as its chair. The committee is scheduling meetings in rural communities late this year and early next year to gather input on the chum salmon bycatch issue in the Bering Sea pollock fishery.

Eva Menadelook, who represented Little Diomede in place of a workshop delegate who was weathered in on the island, said her brother has sent samples from mammals that don't seem normal to the Alaska Department of Fish and Game for analysis, but has received no response from the agency. She said she has seen walrus livers as black and white as the screen presenters used to project images. "We send them out and don't get a report whether they are safe to eat," she added. "A spotted seal I cut, my fingers went right through the meat. We sent it out to ADF&G and got no report. They don't support us, no one does, and I hope this is not the same."

Menadelook urged the NMFS scientists to learn directly from subsistence users how many of their resources are diminishing before conducting bottom trawl surveys that disturb the sea floor habitat. "Mammals are going down," she said. "...

The Bering Sea is our primary resource, and the second is state and federal funds. We can't go without subsistence resources." She said Steller sea lions have been coming to Diomede in the last 10-15 years and never before.

"In the early 1980s people on Diomede noted less clams in the stomachs of walruses," Menadelook continued. "They are a delicacy for us. Women divided walrus clams from the stomach. Now it is rare to bring walrus clams [to others]. Whoever gets it keeps all [of the clams in the] stomach. There is no joy in sharing." She also said walrus blubber is getting thinner and yellow. A NMFS scientist later told her that a veterinarian who analyzed yellow blubber in a walrus reported it was caused by parasites blocking bile ducts.

Tom Okleasik, a former Nomeite who now lives in Kotzebue, is a member of the council's Rural Outreach Committee. He told Yeung he hopes protocols representing marine mammal hunters are included in the NSBRA research plan. "What is the outreach plan for the northern Bering Sea?" he asked.

"Nothing now," Yeung replied. She asked if the council has such a plan.

"I am staff to the Rural Outreach Committee," said Nicole Kimball. "This today is the first big step." Results of the workshop will be sent to all participants for review, and if a more targeted outreach plan is needed, the committee will develop one, Kimball added.

What's the rush?

The NMFS scientists repeatedly assured community representatives that flatfish harvesters are not anxious to move into the northern Bering Sea because flatfish are plentiful in their current fishing grounds and are not vet numerous in northern waters.

"If there is truly no pressing desire of industry to get up there, you should be as conservative as possible," stated Julie Raymond-Yakoubian, Kawerak Inc.'s social scientist. She said she understands the value of site-specific research, but there is a huge body of research on the impacts of bottom trawling in other areas that could be used to advantage.

"I can't see what the rush is," said Weaver Ivanoff of Unalakleet. "I just got involved." He said the bottom trawl survey could wait until information holes are filled in. "Because a lot of communities on the coast are unaware of this, there needs to be more consultation with the communities. We can provide information, but we can't collectively say, 'This is what you can do or not.' Leaders of communities have to be involved, and they have not had a chance. I really want to see this delayed.'

David said this is the first time workshop participants from Norton Sound and the Yukon area have been involved in NBSRA discussions, and they do not represent all of the villages in those areas. "You've heard about Nelson Island for two and a half years. These islanders from King and Diomede islands also are going to be [hurt], and we haven't heard their story yet. You haven't looked beyond Bristol Bay. Our goals are the same—survival of the Native people, people who live off the ocean and have no income....

"We're moving too fast," David continued. "One of my elders, Philip

"All of these villages have all the environmental risk and yet zero to little economic benefit. There is an economic deficit to subsistence on top of the environment being ruined."

- Tom Okleasik

Moses, who is almost 90 now, said, 'We are moving too fast,' but yet we are trying to find answers to these questions just on Nelson Island and Kuskokwim Bay, never beyond....

Hear their story and work with them." Following a presentation by NMFS scientist Craig Rose on development of modified gear for bottom trawl fishing, Kenneth Kingeekuk of Savoonga recalled that Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. had cleaned beaches a couple of years ago on St. Lawrence Island. He said tons of net that had held the bones of seals, walruses and whales for years were removed. "Even though you are doing a scientific experiment, you are hurting our people," Kingeekuk said. "Once again, all scientists here, make my people understand. Come to our villages. I have seen the affects of trawlers on our island—tons [of marine mammals] wasted in nets.'

Okleasik added the following comments: "All of these villages have all the environmental risk and yet zero to little economic benefit. There is an economic deficit to subsistence on top of the environment being ruined. What is the benefit for promoting commercial fishing when the environment is just downgraded? The research presented on crabs, seabirds, trawls lacked Native community involvement....

"What are the staffing plans to include Alaska Native scientists?" asked Oklesik. "...Right now you are getting an F, so there is huge room improvement....Trawls are geared to the corporate fishery. What research have you done to allow village boats to harvest, to use our resources? I don't know how well you understand. In Nome I scooped cigar fish (capelin) in my hands and took them home from the beach. Rivers used to bubble with salmon. The changes just from when I was a kid are real changes.'

"Small-scale fishing gear is not in my area, and I get a zero for that, and I don't know what resources are available for that," replied Rose.

Tribal consultation

'Tribal consultation is to sit at the table to participate in development [of research plans], not sit on the sidelines," said Art Ivanoff of Unalakleet. Tribal delegates from 11 villages in the Norton Sound area participated in a tribal consultation with representatives of NMFS and the NPFMC Feb. 16 in Unalakleet. Ivanoff reported the tribes flatly declared they do not want bottom trawl fishing expanded northward into the northern Bering Sea.

As Ivanoff noted, Executive order 13175 of Nov. 6, 2000 charged executive departments and agencies with engaging in regular and meaningful consultation and collaboration with tribal officials in the development of federal policies that have tribal implications.

On Nov. 5, 2009 President
Barack Obama directed each agency head to submit to the Director of the Office and Management and Budget within 90 days a detailed plan of actions the agency will take to implement the policies and directives of Executive Order 13175. The NMFS recently created a new web page for tribal consultation issues at www.alaskafisheries.noaa.gov/tc/.

Ivanoff has persuaded a number of organizations to support his efforts to create four new voting seats on the NPFMC to be filled by appointment of members of federally recognized tribes or Alaska Native organizations who are not employed by a community development quota program or the pollock industry. A proposed resolution to ask the Alaska Congressional delegation to introduce and seek passage of an amendment to the Magnuson-Stevens Act to create the four seats is under consideration in the Alaska Senate.

Yeung and her fellow scientists assured community representatives they had heard them. Scientists and subsistence users said they had learned much during the meeting.

Boys, girls take wins before heading to regionals

Nome's boys and girls basketball teams headed off to Unalaska for the Western Regional Basketball Tournament buoyed by back-to-back wins for each team at the expense of Unalakleet.

The boys claimed their victories during their last two home games of the season. Jeremy Head led the Nanooks in Friday's 68-33 win with 23 points. Head was backed up by Jode Babcock's 17 points. Tallman Christian Leckband was back on the court after recovering from a leg injury, adding seven points to the effort.

Nome got off to a quick lead in the first quarter, outscoring the Wolfpack 31-11. They never looked back, leading Unalakleet the rest of the way throughout the game.

The Nanooks put the exclamation point on the end of their regular season Saturday night, putting up a triple-digit effort in another lopsided game against Unalakleet. The Wolfpack scored 35 in the effort. Individual results for the game were unavailable.

The Lady Nanooks took their first win of the weekend in a much closer match in Unalakleet Friday evening. Nome won the game 40-37.

Nome was trailing 17-24 at the half, but were able to turn it around in the third quarter with a 14-2 effort. The Lady Nanooks were able to hold on to the lead, even as Unalakleet drained a three-pointer at the buzzer, trimming Nome's advantage to only three.

The Lady Nanooks were led by Devynn Johnson with 26 points and six rebounds. Iris Warnke-Green grabbed 11 rebounds, backed up by Richelle Horner who had eight boards of her own. Unalakleet was led by Christina Towarak's 15 points.

Nome carried its momentum from the second half of Friday night into Saturday's game in Unalakleet. The Lady Nanooks handily won the game 52-26. Nine Lady Nanooks got in on the scoring in the game. Johnson led with nine points, followed by eight from Warnke-Green and Hilary Stiles. Renee Lammer and Rachel Pomeranz each scored seven points.

Both the boys and girls teams are currently in Unalaska for the regional tourney. Both teams were slated to play Hooper Bay on Wednesday. Results of the game were unavailable as of press time. In addition to the Nanooks and Hooper Bay, Kotzebue, Barrow, Dillingham, Bethel and Unalaska will be vying for the two state tournament berths to be won.

BACK HAULIN'-John Pete from Stebbins shrink-wraps boxes holding electronic waste in the Bering Air hanger Feb. 17. The palette of electronics was loaded on an Everts cargo plane and shipped to Anchorage.

Taking out the trash

Recycling program marks forward progress on backhaul plans

By Tyler Rhodes

When a cargo plane touches down in a rural Alaska, it comes loaded with several tons of goods-consisting of everything from TVs and toothpaste to batteries and bacon.

Once all those pounds hit the ground in a hub like Nome and then are parceled out and shipped to the villages down the line, they are in the bush to stay. "Every time a plane takes off, it's 25,000 pounds of stuff going out to rural Alaska, and they're coming back empty," said Everts Air Cargo's Manny Masony.

While the packaging from the toothpaste and bacon can be dealt with in the village, it just got easier in the Bering Strait region to book the TVs and batteries a return trip back to Anchorage once they have outlived their usefulness.

Representatives of villages and tribes from throughout the area came together in Nome for a conference in mid-February that, among other issues, put in motion a backhaul plan for environmentally damaging waste.

With several carriers delivering cargo to Nome every day followed by smaller flight services ferrying it on to the villages, the amount of stuff piling up in rural Alaska is an evercompounding phenomenon. Especially troublesome are items such as car batteries and electronic wastethings like televisions, computer monitors, printers and fax machines. Containing a mix of metals, acids and other ingredients you don't want to come into contact with, the batteries and "e-waste" can cause problems when just tossed into a landfill. The effect is compounded when the items are burned, which is often how trash is dealt with in rural Alaska.

The newly established backhaul program aims to take those items that have the greatest potential to harm the environment and transport them to Anchorage where they can be properly processed. With the cooperation of several corporate entities, the program aims to make the service as economical as possible.

The backhaul effort, which received its first test run Feb. 18, requires the involvement and good will of several organizations and businesses. Just as it takes a coordinated supply chain to deliver goods to Alaska's most remote communities, the same applies to running the process in reverse.

Bering Air will participate by getting the waste out of the villages and into to Nome free of charge. "We're just trying to keep the villages clean," said Bering Air's David Olson. "It's always nice to get the junk out of the villages.'

Once the goods arrive at Bering Air's hanger, a team from Kawerak Inc. will come and either prepare the items to be shipped to Anchorage or will gather them until enough recyclables and waste arrive to merit preparing a palette. When a paletteor palettes—are ready to be shipped, they will be taken to Everts Air Cargo which will fly the goods to Anchorage for a reduced backhaul rate.

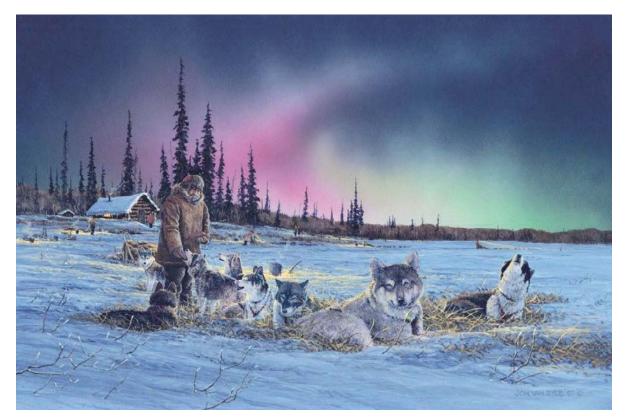

Once in Anchorage, the e-waste recycling firm Total Reclaim will accept the goods and process them, again at a reduced rate. "There's so many players," said Kawerak's Anahma Saito.

While the participation of the air carriers, Kawerak and Total Reclaim are key to making the project succeed, the initial effort needs to start within the individual communities of the region. "It's just my personal opinion, but I think every village needs to take care of its own waste,' said Eric Morris, a conference participant from White Mountain.

Judging by the showing at the recent conference, Morris is not alone in that opinion.

The participation of a couple of dozen participants for the conference would seem to indicate that many villages are ready to toe the line. Kawerak's Saito, who helped put the conference together, said 11 out of the 15 area villages and 13 of the 20 regional tribes had representation at the meeting.

Saito added that there was no budget to transport and lodge the attendees for the Nome meeting. Participants came on either their organization's or their own dime. Saito said that so many were willing to come despite the costs shows a dedication to the issue. "I see a grassroots movement as people motivated by passion," Saito said. "I think this workshop helped us take it to the next level."

Old plan gets a new direction

The idea of using all that empty space on departing cargo planes for some sort of benefit to the region is nothing new. The current recycling/disposal backhaul plan actually is working into a shell that was created a few years ago. "The Bering Strait Development Council decided that backhauling our scrap steel and iron a couple of years ago would be a great economic development project," Saito said.

The council, an advisory board that addresses economic and development issues in the region, sought to take advantage of high scrap metal prices at the time. A precipitous drop in the metal market cut the program short before it could ever get up and running; but the preliminary work was in place.

When the suggestion was made at a recent council meeting that more focus be given to addressing waste that can leach toxins into the environment, the backhaul plan was back on the table. When the plan was applied to hauling waste, however, a key difference arose—cost.

Backhauling steel and iron was supposed to make money. In contrast, there's not much of a market for the items you don't want fouling your community. But the recycling effort is not about making money, so much as taking care of the environment that supports villages in a place where a subsistence lifestyle is still predominantly practiced. "We're real excited about recycling electronics," said conference participant Richard Kuzuguk from Shishmaref. "I think it's going to make a huge impact on future generations."

Saito noted that to make the backhaul program work, communities need to accept that part of acquiring goods like computers and batteries is also having a plan for getting rid of them properly. "We would encourage villages to budget for backhaul," she said. As an example, she offered the idea of when schools order computers, they include in the expenditure funds to send old computers out.

Morris, from White Mountain, echoed that idea, offering that communities should work to minimize the waste coming in as well as ensuring a plan is in place to eventually get it out. That idea doesn't only apply to the people living in the village. "Projects coming into the community, they need to be responsible for what they bring in too," he said.

Morris also noted that a balance needs to be struck between economic development and establishing safeguards for the environment. "Nobody wants to go broke saving the environment," he said. "The object is to not put the burden on municipalities or tribes."

The commercial entities participating in the project are working to make the economic impact on the communities as light as possible. Bering Air is backhauling free from the villages to Nome. Everts is flying the material back to Anchorage for 12.5 cents a pound, half its normal backhaul rate. Masony from Everts said the remaining fee covers its agent costs on the ground. "When Anahma called me up and shared her thought process and her vision, it pretty much coincided with our thought process as a business," Masony said. "We see it as a community service. It was a great opportunity.

Costs are incurred again once the recyclables and junk arrive in Anchorage. Total Reclaim charges 25 cents a pound to process the items. Once again, the charge is at a discount, 10 cents off the price charged for Anchorage-area customers. Total Reclaim is also not charging a pick-up fee to come get the goods from Everts.

Global citizens at the far end of the world

In addition to some of the groundwork for a backhaul program already in place, there is also an example of a working recycling program in the region. Shishmaref's Kuzuguk has helped establish an aluminum can recycling program in his community.

Kuzuguk said the recycling effort, which got up and running under the Indian Environmental General Assistance Program, came after study and consideration. He said the global impact that recycling had in reducing energy use and pollution was a big driver in getting the Shishmaref program up and running. "We discovered the efficiency of recycling versus making new was outrageous" be said.

new was outrageous," he said.

In addition to helping Shishmaref be a better global citizen, the recycling effort had a big impact at home. Kuzuguk estimated the landfill saw a 33 percent to 65 percent reduction in the amount of trash it was receiving. Much of that reduction was made through a campaign to increase public awareness. Now instead of heading to the landfill, the cans catch a flight to Anchorage for processing.

Like the scrap metal market, the aluminum can business doesn't yield as much return as it previously had. Kuzuguk said he has steadily seen the amount per-pound his group receives drop. But like the new backhaul program, the recycling effort was not intended as a money-maker. Kuzuguk said the money that is generated from the recycling is put back into the program to pay for bags to hold the cans and to fund the community's summer youth litter patrol program. Kuzuguk especially lauds the work the young people of Shishmaref in both recycling and the litter patrol efforts. "I'm real proud of the kids who participate back home. Their effort is astronomical," he said.

Kuzuguk believes Shishmaref will participate in the backhaul program, noting that in the last community cleanup, electronic waste was separated out from other trash. Previously, he said most of the used electronics ended up in the landfill. "Our landfill is already limited," he said. Space is indeed limited in Shishmaref where erosion continually eats away at the barrier island on which the community sits.

While Shishmaref's recycling program has benefitted the community, it has also served as example in the region that such programs can work in rural Alaska. Saito said that's important, noting that all too often rural Alaskans will go to a conference in Anchorage or in the lower 48 and become inspired to implement something back home. When they get home, however, they often find what they learned outside the village didn't take into account many of the challenges faced in rural Alaska. "We wanted to feature people in the region who have started programs," Saito said.

In addition to highlighting Shishmaref's recycling efforts, Morris and Irving Ashenfelter from White Mountain presented their work on forming a watershed cooperative for their area. Again he said the idea was to find the balance between development and ensuring the environment can continue to support local populations. "Protecting subsistence resources is where the buck stops with me-and where the buck stops for most of the people, I think,' Morris said. "I accept a certain amount of environmental degradation. But we want to make sure we'll still have water to drink, fish can survive and people can still put food on the table."

Heidi Herter, Nome's agent for the University of Alaska Fairbanks Marine Advisory Program and another organizer of the February Nome conference, said the backhaul program ties in well to addressing water quality in communities. Herter said through snowmelt and the natural drainage systems in the region, pollutants on the ground will eventually work their way to water.

Herter and Saito jointly put the conference together after realizing they both were aiming to work the same group of people, with Saito aiming to address solid waste issues and Herter wanting to focus on water quality. "I had something like this [conference] in mind for about two years. It didn't happen until I got in contact with Anahma Saito," Herter said.

A test run

With all the players in town, including representatives from Everts and electronics recycler Total Reclaim, the conference last week put the backhaul plan into action with a shipment Feb. 18. Participants gathered at the Bering Air hangar to get a short lesson on the best way to package the goods for shipment. On hand were Everts' Masony and Riley Kosinski, outreach coordinator for Total Reclaim.

Kosinski gave a quick primer on just what is inside many of the electronics. He noted that computer monitors and television sets contain anywhere from four to eight pounds of lead. He said Total Reclaim will sort out seven different metals from the circuitry of electronics.

He suggested using other recyclable material, such as plastic water bottles, as packaging material for the electronics. Even materials that can't be recycled could be used as packaging and then eventually diverted to Anchorage's landfill, he said. "They don't have landfills out here like in Anchorage," he said.

The backhaul program will also take larger appliances out of villages, like refrigerators, washing machines, ranges and dishwashers. "If it can fit on a plane, it can fit in our shop," Kosinski said.

After the quick demonstration, the boxes of electronics that originated from Shishmaref were shrinkwrapped tightly on a palette and taken over to Everts for loading for the return trip to Anchorage.

There were several batteries also brought in for recycling. Batteries, however, require special care for shipping. The battery recycling program is being conducted through Interstate Batteries, which facilitates the shipping since a permit is required.

Interstate provides, on loan, a special hard plastic container for the batteries. The container is lined with vermiculite, which looks a lot like kitty litter, along the bottom to absorb any acid if it leaks. Layers of plywood and cardboard are also used to isolate the batteries from each other and further ensure nothing seeps out. "We probably have a surplus of batteries to get rid of in the villages," Saito said.

Saito said the benefit of having the conference watch the first load of e-waste get processed and shipped out goes beyond a lesson in how to properly package the goods. The example showed that the multiple players in getting the program off the ground—from the air carriers to the recyclers—are willing and committed to making it happen. "Doing the backhaul together, it answered a lot of questions. It gave confidence in the system," she said.

Margaret Kenavoak Picnalook

Shishmaref on June 8, 1920. Margaret was raised at Ikpik; her parents were reindeer herders so she grew up wherever the reindeer migrated. She always remembered riding the reindeer like a horse and playing with one specific reindeer, which she claimed as her pet. When she was a young teenager she moved to Brevig. Living in Brevig she met and later married James Sango Picnalook on March 18, 1938. Together they raised 15 children.

She had a strong belief in God and prayed every day for all her family. She enjoyed camping, berry picking, sewing and being outdoors. She learned how to prepare and store her Native food. She was also wellknown for her ability to sew beautiful parkas, mukluks, slippers and krupuks which she learned to do on her own and was also very good at it. Her pride and joy was adopting and raising Elton, which made her strong and strive to live a longer life. Daphne, Thomas and Margaret were taught by her to call her MOM...and nothing else.

Margaret worked at Maynard Mc-Dougal Memorial Hospital from the early 1950s to the early 1970s as a cook. Before working at the hospital, she was working as a skin sewer at Polet's. She was also one of the skin sewers that made the banners at Our Savior Lutheran Church in Nome. In 1973 they moved back to Brevig Mission when her husband, James became the lay pastor at the Brevig Mission Lutheran Church and they lived there until the early 1980s. She later came back to Brevig where she resided until she went to be with the Lord. Margaret will be greatly missed and will be remembered for her wisdom, love and inspiration to all she knew and met, especially her children.

Margaret is preceded in death by her parents John and Lena Ahnangnatoguk; brothers Walter, Victor Weakuk, Andrew, Ira and George Ahnangnatoguk; sisters Dorcas Rock, Donna Kline and Agnes Ahnangnatoguk; husband James Picnalook, Sr.; daughters Bertha Dorcas, Bertha and Joanne; sons Isaac, Henry, Elton, James Jr., Albert, Raymond and Albert. Margaret is survived by her siblings Frank Ahnangnatoguk (Edna), Allen Ahnangnatoguk, Della Walluk, Mary Sallee and Agnes Pagel.

She is also survived by her children Mina Picnalook, Arlene (Verne Day), Alberta (George Westdahl), Karen (Jeff Hadley), Doris (Gary Kinlock) and Elton Alan Picnalook. There are also many grandchildren, great-grandchildren, three greatgreat-grandchildren and many nieces and nephews.

Chocolate may be good for your brain and heart

Here is more good news for chocolate lovers. Eating chocolate appears to lower your risk of having a stroke, according to an analysis of research scheduled to be presented at the American Academy of Neurology's Annual Meeting next month.

Three studies met criteria for the analysis. The first study found that over 44,000 people who ate one serving of chocolate per week were 22 percent less likely to have a stroke than people who ate no chocolate. The second study found that 1,169 people who ate 50 grams of chocolate (about ½ chocolate bar) once a week were 46 percent less likely to die following a stroke than people who did not eat chocolate. A third study did not find a link between chocolate consumption and risk of stroke.

The positive news is not surprising. Over the last several years, research shows that chocolate, in moderation, improves overall cardiovascular health by lowering blood pressure, reducing inflammation, moderating platelet activity, and lowering harmful blood fats.

Chocolate even seems to help patients who have already had a heart attack. In a study published in the Journal of Internal Medicine in September of 2009, patients who ate chocolate two or more times a week had a 66 percent reduced risk of dying from a subsequent heart attack compared to patients who did not eat chocolate.

The health benefits of chocolate stem from naturally occurring compounds called flavonoids. In addition to chocolate, flavonoids are found in many plants and plant-derived foods such as blueberries, cranberries, apples, peanuts, onions, tea, and red wine. There are more than 4,000 different flavonoid compounds. The active compound in chocolate appears to be a powerful flavonoid called epicatechin that has insulin-mimicking effects, reduces vessel-damaging inflammation, and promotes heart health.

According to a study published in the journal Circulation in 2007, the heart-protective benefits of the flavonoids in dark chocolate seem to appear within two hours of consumption.

Not all chocolate has the same benefit. Cocoa is the healthy flavonoidrich ingredient in chocolate. Therefore dark chocolate, which has a higher cocoa concentration, is considered more beneficial than milk chocolate, which has a higher proportion of sugar and saturated fats. Furthermore, dark chocolate is processed in a way that preserves up to 95% of the flavonoid

Despite the heart healthy effects of dark chocolate, eating chocolate should not take the place of daily exercise, a nutritious diet, and taking medication as prescribed.

However, when choosing a dessert or light snack, adding a little dark chocolate may have its place in protecting your heart and brain. If an apple a day keeps the doctor away, perhaps dipping the apple in a dark chocolate sauce will keep the cardiologist and neurologist away. Perhaps I've gone too far. Be well.

Hi Nancy,

I just wanted to tell you that I LOVE being able to read The Nome Nugget online. I grew up in Nome and my mom (Thulan Munn) and my sister (Kim Knudsen) still live there. Recently with everything that has been happening with the school board and Janeen Sullivan/Doug Boyer, there have been groups created on Facebook where people who feel strongly about the issues voice their opinions. Because I always liked Mrs. Sullivan but also because I had grown up being friends with Kirsten Timbers I really didn't know which side to take.

Then I was sent the online article about the meetings that have been taking place in Nome and I was able to fully understand what was happening and why. It was great to hear opinions from both sides and from that I was able to make my own conclusions about who I really wanted

I've also enjoyed reading all the letters to the editor and I was thrilled to see that your niece, Christina McGuire, had written in.

Dear Editor,

A letter to the editor in the February 25 issue of The Nome Nugget addressed the S.P.A.N.S. scholarship program. Specifically, it questioned Nome Eskimo Community's involvement in the SPANS program, and expressed concern about residency requirements for students applying for scholarships that are available within the Bering Strait re-

Nome Eskimo Community has never participated in the S.P.A.N.S. scholarship program, and administers our own program for our Tribal members. Eligibility for these scholarships is not based on residency in Nome, nor is there a requirement about students returning to Nome upon graduation. In order for a student to qualify for a Nome Eskimo Community scholarship, they only need to be tribally-enrolled, and maintain minimum GPA and credits per semester at an accredited college or university.

Our Tribal Council and members are very proud of the NEC scholarship program. This past year, we were able to offer over $120,000 in higher education scholarships to students living all over the United States. While some of these students have never lived in Nome, or will never return to reside here, we are proud of their achievements, and will continue to offer scholarships and support the educational endeavors of all our members.

Sincerely, Nome Eskimo Community Denise Barengo, Executive Director Nome, AK

Dear Editor, On behalf of the Bering Straits Foundation Board of Directors and staff, I wish to share the following information to our shareholders regarding our Foundation's Scholarship Program. The Bering Straits Foundation was incorporated in 1991. Our mission is as follows: "To enrich the lives of our people and strengthen self-sufficiency by supporting educational goals, cultural heritage and traditional values."

In the 19 years of operation, the Bering Straits Foundation is pleased to have awarded hundreds of educational scholarships to our shareholders and lineal descendents of shareholders. More recently, we have enhanced our program by offering cultural heritage fellowship grant awards. Shareholders and lineal descendents are eligible regardless of their place of residence.

The Seward Peninsula Application Network Scholarship or SPANS was created at the direction of the presidents of the Bering Straits Foundation, Norton Sound Economic Development Corporation, Kawerak, Norton Sound Health Corporation, and Sitnasuak Foundation. The intent was to create one application for students applying for scholarships from any of the five participating organizations. While each organization retains its own unique scholarship eligibility requirements, the purpose of having one application was designed to make the application process more efficient and user-friendly for our students. Specific eligibility requirements for each

www.beringstraits.com/foundation/scholarships.html and clicking onto the new SPANS application link. While two of the participating SPANS organizations do specify that they have residency requirements, it is clearly stated that neither Bering Straits Foundation nor Sitnasuak Foundation have this same policy. Under the SPANS umbrella, each organization is still solely responsible for their respective scholarship pro-

I hope this information is helpful to clarify the objectives of SPANS and of the Bering Straits Foundation scholarship program. Clearly, a review of the Foundation's track record of scholarship awards does not support the assertion that shareholders or lineal descendents who did not intend to return to the region are ineligible for any of the scholarships we offer.

Thank you for the opportunity to respond to questions regarding the Foundation. I encourage others with questions about our programs and services to direct them to either me or Kirsten Timbers, BSF Executive Vice President at the Foundation Office, P. O. Box 1008, Nome, Alaska 99762, Ph: 907-443-4305, mud and bare ground, to name a few. "First there was too much snow, then there was no snow," said Nome racer Howard Farley at the race's halfway banquet held in Nome Feb. 24.

Bering Straits Foundation Carolyn Crowder President

Several of those tossed out of the race early were legends and past champions. Names like Scott Davis, Todd Palin, Marc McKenna, and Dusty Van-Meter were all sidelined just hours into the race. By the time the race braked for its halfway stop in Nome, only 16 of the 29 teams remained in the race. Much of the trouble could be traced back to the Farewell Burn between Rohn and Nikolai—a treacherous stretch where conditions varied between mud and dry ground.

"You could have rode a mountain bike through there," Nomeite Howard Farley said. Nome racer Johnny Bahnke said he swatted his first mosquito of the year while dealing with the snowless 50- to 100-mile section of trail. "It went from deep snow and tough going to no snow and tough going—and it stayed the same temperature," he said. "It really looked like the end of September out there."

Bahnke and others said they were not surprised at the high attrition rate so early in the race due to the brutal conditions right out of the gate. With no snow, overheating machines were par for the rough course.

While Farley and his brother, Harvey Farley, were able to battle their way to the finish in Fairbanks in 11th place, no other Nome-connected team was even able to make it to the halfway point in their hometown. Nome's Tre West III saw his race end before he and partner Tommy Kriska even encountered the dry Farewell Burn. The duo's race came to a stop just past Shell Lake, a little more than 100 miles into the race. West said Kriska's snowmachine nose-dived into the deep snow, sending him for a tumble, which ended with the snowmachine on top of him. West said Kriska had to get surgery for a broken arm.

Nomeites Mike Morgan and Joe Fullwood made it through the Burn to McGrath before having to scratch due to mechanical issues with their Polaris Rush 600s. Bahnke and his partner from Kiana, Brad Reich, nearly made it to Nome before Bahnke's Ski-Doo MXZ 600 finally quit after gradually losing speed along the trail. "Our motors got really hot on the first day," Bahnke said. "It was grueling. It was tough." Reich towed Bahnke's machine to Unalakleet where they officially pulled out of the race.

Despite the mechanical issues, Bahnke said he felt the race was going well for him and Reich. "We kept plugging away, slow and steady," he said. "It was working for us."

Even though the Farleys were the only Nome riders to complete the 2,000-mile race this year, their ride was not without bumps and bruises. They blew their shocks on their Ski-Doo Renegade E-Tec 600s within the first 100 miles of the race and were not able to replace them until Nome. "My back's my shock right now," Harvey Farley said at the halfway banquet. Howard Farley blew out a clutch bearing just outside of Galena requiring an hour's worth of work on the frozen Yukon River and another hour back in the shop. The Farleys were able to get replacement parts from team 33 of Aaron Bartel and Jason Wichman who had scratched in Galena.

The brothers ultimately finished the race in 64:32:36. They were not the red lantern bearers, however, with the 12th and final team of Tracy and Jeffery Dyer crossing the line with a total time of 69:02:07.

The race was not without its close calls and serious injuries. In addition to Kriska's broken arm, Shane Barber suffered a broken leg after falling off his machine and colliding with his teammate, Aaron Loyer just outside of Nome after the race's restart. An Alaska Army National Guard Blackhawk helicopter was dispatched to pick up Barber 11 miles east of town, near Cape Nome. Barber was brought back to Nome and was later medivaced to Anchorage for further treatment.

Barber's wife, Tammy Barber, was also racing this year as part of the only all-woman team in the race. Racing with Jana Pevan, the ladies were only the third all-woman team to tackle the Iron Dog. Tammy Barber and Pevan were still in Nome, ready to start the second half of the race, when Loyer returned with news of Shane Barber's injuries. Despite her wounded husband, Tammy Barber decided to continue on, only to have to scratch in White Mountain due to mechanical issues.

ON THEIR WAY OUT—Team 29 of Robbie Muir and Jeremiah Jones make their way back on the course just east of Nome Feb. 24. The duo weather permitting. Tre West said he will be back to defend his title in the Nome-Golovin race slated for March 13. The race starts and ends on the ice at the east end of town.

Native corps, NSEDC team to buy Pilgrim

Ownership suit by Greens still in play

By Diana Haecker

On Friday, March 5 the new ownership of Pilgrim Hot Springs appeared to have been decided when U.S. Bankruptcy Court Judge Donald MacDonald selected a $1.9 million bid submitted by Unaatuq Inc., largely owned by a consortium of the region's Native corporations.

But on the same day, a request to stay the sale of Pilgrim was successful in U.S. District Court, effectively putting a temporary hold on the transaction. However, in a rapidly changing series of court proceedings, the sale of the property north of Nome has now gone forward as U.S. District Court Judge Ralph Beistline, who last Friday had granted the temporary stay of the sale, lifted the stay.

Call for help in Golovin comes to a deadly end

By Tyler Rhodes

An attempt to escort a Golovin man to Nome and then on to Anchorage for treatment of mental health issues turned tragic last week when a Nome-based Alaska State Trooper shot and killed him in apparent self-defense.

Troopers announced the evening of March 3 that one of its officers shot Joseph Amaktoolik, 38, earlier that day when Amaktoolik emerged from his home in Golovin with a rifle in hand. Troopers later identified the officer as Jonnathon Stroebele.

Golovin, which the state says has a population of 160, is approximately 70 linear miles east of Nome on the Norton Sound coast.

Letters —

I am writing in my capacity as a sponsor of petitions to recall four out of the five Nome School Board members, namely, Gloria Karmun, Albert McComas, Kirsten Timbers and Heather Payenna. I, and the other sponsors of these petitions, made the decision to use the recall process for these four after much careful deliberation, and after we felt that all other avenues available to us had been exhausted. The grounds stated in the petitions were carefully thought out and detail the Board's illegal and unethical actions, including violations of law and their own policies. These same grounds, word for word, are now being used by a separate group of citizens in a petition to recall the fifth school board member, Barb Nickels.

First of all, I would like to thank this other group of citizens for agreeing with us that the Board acted illegally and in violation of their own policies in their decision to not renew the contracts of Nome-Beltz principal, Janeen Sullivan, and vice-principal, Doug Boyer. I am sure they stand behind these grounds as strongly as we do, as the recall process is a serious matter, not to be used merely as a political tool.

While we share this group's apparent outrage over the Board's illegal and unethical actions, we would like to respectfully point out to them why it does not make sense to include Ms. Nickels in the recall effort. Ms. Nickels is the only Board member who has spoken out against the Board's lack of proper procedure and has repeatedly called for a public discussion of the reasons for the other Board members' actions, with which she strongly disagrees. Her detailed letter in the February 18th issue of The Nome Nugget makes it clear that she was not a willing participant in the illegal and unethical actions that took place in the Board's closed-door session.

For these reasons, Nome Citizens for Open and Ethical School Board is seeking recall of Board members Karmun, McComas, Timbers and Pavenna only.

Sincerely, Julie Kelso Nome, AK

The Spirit of Iditarod

The Iditarod Sled Dog Race is one of those events that give us a chance to appreciate our town's history, enjoy the present and anticipate the future. We wonder what it must have been like to live in Nome with the threat of a diphtheria epidemic. Were families frightened? What thoughts ran through their heads? Today we can appreciate the heroic actions of the mushers and their teams as they braved the bitter cold and fearsome forces of nature and carried the life-saving serum to Nome. These Alaskans had no Gortex or duct tape. They were tough and they were driven.

As the Iditarod racers head up the trail, Nomeites get ready in the true spirit of the race- we party. We play basketball, we race snowmachines, we sing and dance, we eat good food, and we renew old acquaintances, enjoy the arts and make new friends. We just roll up our sleeves, volunteer our time and talents and have fun while the Spirit of Iditarod moves us.

During Iditarod we experience what can happen when our town works together. We know we can rally to the count. We know we can make things happen. We know we have one of the best communities in the nation and we are proud of our past, take pride in the present and have hope for the future. The Spirit of Iditarod is alive and well in Nome. - N.L.M.-

Legislators leave Juneau for energy conference in DC

A third of Alaska's legislators left Juneau to attend the annual conference of the Energy Council in Washington DC last week. The Energy Council is a group of a dozen oil and gas producing U.S states, Canadian provinces and Venezuela.

The mid-session exodus out of Juneau drew some heat from constituents, in light of the shorter, 90day legislative session. Legislators agreed that it was good to get out of Juneau and have energy issues discussed in a broader perspective. According to APRN, Republican Representative Jay Ramras said the trip expanded the legislators' horizons and exposed them to the global and political marketplace.

First Climate Science Center to open in Alaska

U.S. Department of Interior Secretary Ken Salazar announced last week that the first of eight regional Climate Science Centers is slated to open at the University of Alaska. Sec. Salazar said that rapidly melting Arctic sea ice and permafrost, and threats to Alaska coastal communities make Alaska ground zero for climate change. The purpose of these climate centers is to facilitate cooperation and consultation between scientists and other state and federal agencies to respond to climate change. The new Climate Science Center at the University of Alaska is slated to be formally established in Anchorage within six to eight weeks. In addition to the Alaska region, Climate Science Centers will be selected in seven other areas throughout the U.S.

Study finds Arctic seabed seeps methane

An international research team led by UAF scientists found that a section of the Arctic Ocean seafloor that holds vast stores of frozen methane is showing signs of widespread venting of the powerful greenhouse gas. The research results were published in the March 5 issue of the journal Science and show that the permafrost under the East Siberian Arctic shelf is leaking large amounts of methane into the atmosphere. This could trigger abrupt climate warming, warn the scientists.

Alaska exports totaled $3.3 billion

Despite a less than rosy worldwide economy, Alaskan exports last year totaled $3.3 billion, marking the fifth best year for trade in the state's history. While 2009 exports were 8.1 percent lower than in 2008, the nationwide trend was a decline of 17.9 percent. First-quarter exports in 2009 were down nearly 30 percent from the first quarter of 2008. But at the end of 2009, fourth-quarter exports were up 12.3 percent from a year earlier. Alaska's exports of minerals, precious metals and forest products increased, while seafood and energy exports declined.

Governor throws his weight behind Red Dog mine

Citing the potential for severe economic impacts, Governor Sean Parnell has called for an accelerated resolution to an administrative appeal challenging a crucial federal permit for the Red Dog Mine. Environmental groups have appealed a decision by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency to renew the National Pollutant Discharge Elimination System permit for Red Dog, located 82 miles north of Kotzebue.

Wulik River. The appellants say that Teck's first 20 years of operation had affected their subsistence way of life and that they won't put up with more pollution of their streams. The appeal automatically stayed the permit from going into effect. It is up to the EPA now to make a decision. Parnell intervened, saying that the mine employs 525 people and that the appeal process could interrupt mining at Red Dog, which would have serious consequences on the tax revenues of the Northwest Arctic Borough and the economy.

Run the Iditarod, get an exclusive license plate

The Alaska Division of Motor Vehicles has a new license plate that very few people can get their hands on. In order to get it, one must have shown the "dedication, spirit, and exemplary athletic ability to complete the Iditarod Trail Sled Dog Race.' Iditarod finishers can buy the plates for $50 at DMV offices, but they are only available for vehicles registered in Alaska. Senate Bill 50, sponsored by Senator Charlie Huggins, authorized the creation of the Iditarod plate and passed the 26th Legislature unanimously.

Council reluctantly endorses Steadman site for state offices

By Laurie McNicholas

Nome is in the right spot with the Legislature and the governor to get a new state office building, but if there is a hiccup, the project may drop off the map, Howard Thies told the Nome Common Council during a work session on Monday.

Thies is northern region maintenance and operations director for the Department of Transportation and Public Facilities. He and DOTPF project manager Matt Desalernos asked the council to endorse the Steadman Street site for a new state office building and to agree to vacate a right of way on the property before the department begins a costly platting process with the Nome Planning Commission.

Desalernos and Thies answered probing questions from council members and explained reasons for selecting a lot at Sixth Avenue and Steadman for a 60,000-square-foot, two-story office building. Thies said planning for the building began at 20,000 square feet and then tripled as more and more state agencies asked to be housed in it.

Desalernos said reports that the court system is taking over the old federal building (post office) in Nome are inaccurate. He gave council members copies of e-mail correspondence between him and Lesa Hall of the court system. Hall clarifies the court system's position in the following excerpt from an e-mail to Desalernos dated March 2.

"Matt—the court system has put in an application to take over the federal building in Nome, contingent upon the legislature appropriating all the funding required to take over the building—that is to [take] care of deferred maintenance, do code upgrades, do remodeling, and maintain it. That funding will NOT be provided if the DOT building is funded. The DOT building is our preference, but we need somewhere to live if that funding falls through...."

Desalernos said the court wants to get into the new state office building because a host of new security requirements are hard to implement in the old federal building. "They want 10,000 to 12,000 feet for themselves," he added. He said he would like to see one common security entrance for the district attorney, court, probation offices and children's services.

"It is more costly to build and staff [security entrances] in multiple locations, so it's best to be all in one building," Desalernos said. The units work together and most of their clients are the same, he added. He said the Alaska Department of Fish and Game and DOT have no operational need to be in one building, but it is a lot more cost effective to have them together than in several buildings. The DOTPF would own the building and rent space to other state agencies, he explained.

Councilwoman Mary Knodel expressed strong opposition to moving state offices away from Front Street. She said Desalernos had indicated in a report that it would cost $6 million to retrofit the current state office building and bring it up to code. Noting that Gov. Sean Parnell favors deferred maintenance projects, she suggested Desalernos obtain funds to repair the building.

Desalernos argued that the repair cost estimate was based on a report from a structural and civil engineering firm with no knowledge of the building's layout and code needs. and the engineers did not talk with occupants of the facility. "Structurally no one thinks it will fall over tomorrow, but the cross base was caved in three times by storms," he noted. He said the storms flooded the heating and ventilation system.

"The mechanical system in there is basically shot and it's difficult to get parts," he added.

To fix the old building would require taking it back to the studs and installing a new heating and ventilation system perhaps on the roof so storms can't damage the heart and soul of the building, Desalernos said. He also noted that state offices occupy more rented space in Nome than in the current state building. "We can house them for considerably less," he added.

Knodel again said she does not want state offices moved off Front Street. "The rents are not terribly bad," she stated. "Sitnasuak built Toffice spacel for the state and the money they get goes around 11 times in town. Our number one priority in the overall plan is to enhance Front Street, not tear it down." She said if state agencies had signed up for the new building, the council would know how many state personnel would be left downtown.

"No one will sign a lease till we have funds to construct [the new state building]," Desalernos said. He also noted that DOT will request $40 million in construction money but may receive $30 million, in which case some applicants for space will be eliminated. He predicted that solidifying occupants will be a lengthy process, and he said council members are free to call state agencies in Nome and ask them to remain in Front Street offices.

Mayor Denise Michels convened a regular council meeting following a 40minute work session with Desalernos and Thies. During discussion of a resolution to endorse the Steadman Street site for the new state building, Desalernos acknowledged that he had drafted the document. Councilman Jon Larson moved to table the resolution, saying its language needs revision and he wants the city's attorney to review it. The motion failed by a 3-2 vote. (Councilman Jerald Brown was absent.)

Larson then moved to amend the document by (1) deleting the second paragraph, (2) deleting language in the third paragraph that referred to the second paragraph, and (3) adding the language enclosed in quotation marks below to the final paragraph.

Larson objected to the second paragraph because it said the city had endorsed the Steadman Street site for the new state building in Resolution No. R-08-12-03 and in materials presented to the Legislature in the city's 2009 legislative priorities package. Larson noted that the resolution did not mention the Steadman Street site. City Manager Josie Bahnke said the city's issue paper on support for extending Steadman Street to the Bypass Road included an aerial view of the proposed Steadman Street site for the state building.

As reworded by Larson, the final paragraph says the council endorses the Steadman Street site and agrees to vacate that portion of the Sixth Avenue right of way from the western edge of Steadman Street to a line from the northwest corner of block 111 to the southwest corner of lock 125 'subject to a reversionary interest to the city if the project does not proceed." The added language in quotation marks ensures that the city will retain the right of way if the state does not buy the lot from Alaska Gold.

The council unanimously approved Larson's amendments to the resolution and then adopted the amended resolution 4-1 with Knodel voting no.

Public requests

Matt Tomter said the Informed Citizens for an Open School Board group has collected the required number of signatures on petitions to recall Nome Board of Education members Gloria Karmun, Albert McComas, Heather Peyanna and Kirsten Timbers and would submit the petitions to the city on Tuesday. He asked that a special recall election be scheduled as soon as possible after the state certifies the petitions. Joe Kennedy and Doug Johnson voiced support for Tomter's request.

In regard to a recall election, Bahnke said the city attorney advised her to send a letter to the U.S Department of Justice for permission under the Voting Rights Act to schedule the election.

Tomter also said he had read in The Nome Nugget that the city administration is under the impression that just a few people are interested in reopening the bowling alley at the Recreation Center. He asserted that support for the bowling alley is overwhelming in Nome. He asked whether bowling alley supporters need to sign a petition. He said he was out of town on March 1 when the council held a work session to discuss bowling alley issues.

Councilman Stan Andersen said the council has decided to seek solid information by putting out a request for proposals to operate the bowling alley and snack bar. Tomter said if the facility is clean and offers good food and games for kids such as foosball, it will draw customers. "It's kind of jerky, but we're working on it," Andersen replied.

Kirk Reynolds and Terry Day expressed support for the bowling alley. "Let's not go cheap," Day said. "Step up and make it a nice place to go. Kennedy and Johnson also spoke in favor of reopening the bowling alley.

Bridie Trainor, director of Wellness and Suicide Prevention at Kawerak, noted that youths from 12 to 25 years of age are at the highest risk of suicide. She suggested that an area of the bowling alley be equipped with a pool table, a large screen television set, and games such as foosball and a dart board for kids to get together after school. She said Recreation Center Director Chip Leeper is enthused about the idea.

Brenda Evak, a student at Nome-Beltz High School and representative of the Wellness Forum, said kids need a place to get together and the bowling alley could provide a good environment for them.

Later in the meeting Bahnke said that during the council's work session on the bowling alley, she had suggested asking Nome voters whether they want the city to renovate and reopen the facility. She said the question could be placed on the ballot at the special election to recall school board members.

"That's a good idea," said Larson, adding that a number of people have questioned the wisdom of reopening the bowling alley because it has failed in the past.

Other council actions

The council unanimously approved Cornell Companies' renewal application for a correctional facility permit in Nome. Prior to the vote, Knodel asked Bob Weston, director of the facility, how many of the inmates return following their release. "We have a 25 percent success rate, so we see 75 percent of them again," Weston replied. He said he is trying to produce new programs such as life skills training for inmates in cooperation with Behavioral Health Services at Norton Sound Health Corp.

The council adopted an ordinance authorizing Kawerak to lease rooms 203 and 204 at Uiviilat Play and Learn Center for additional office space for $2 per square foot. Bahnke said the move will free up space Kawerak currently occupies to use for infant care. Kawerak wants to remodel the infant care area and has funds to cover the costs, she added.

The council approved a resolution authorizing participation in the Community Coastal Impact Assistance Grant Program for the Port of Nome High Mast Causeway Lighting Project.

A request from the Nome Volunteer Fire Department for a Mini Convention Center fee waiver for an awards banquet April 10 was approved.

Commissioners selected

The council approved recommendations by Mayor Michels to appoint Charlie Lean to the Museum and Library Commission and James Adams, Randy Romenesko and Tom Sparks to the Nome Planning Commission.

Mayor's report

Michels met briefly with Sen. Mark Begich during a recent trip to Washington, D.C., she reported to the council in a memo dated March 3. She said Begich mentioned plans to take Secretary of Commerce Gary Locke and the new U.S. Coast Guard Commandant Robert Papp to Alaska and will stop in Anchorage and Barrow. Michels said Begich recommended that she fly to Anchorage for meetings with them.

"I stated I hope he makes a point to stop in Nome as we have the [port] infrastructure and potential already there, Michels wrote. "I will follow up and write invites to Secretary of Commerce [Locke] and the incoming Commandant Papp. I was surprised that he wouldn't even consider stopping in Nome."

recall the remaining board member, Barb Nickels, reported Tuesday that they too were expecting to have their signatures into City Hall on March 10. As of press time Tuesday, no petitions had crossed the city clerk's desk.

With the bar set at 177 signatures, which is 25 percent of the vote from the most recent school board election, both signature-gathering groups have reported having more than enough to proceed with a recall election. The signatures need to be verified against election records to ensure that those who signed are registered to vote in City of Nome elections. Area residents who live outside the city limits in places like Banner Creek and Dexter are not qualified to sign.

The recall efforts stem from the school board's Jan. 12 decision to not renew the contracts of Nome-Beltz Junior/Senior High School Principal Janeen Sullivan and Assistant Principal Doug Boyer. The board's split decision created a rift in the community, spurring two packed board meetings with speaker after speaker requesting the board to reverse their decision or at least offer a reason why the two administrators were not retained. A smaller contingent also addressed the board at both meetings to offer support for the decision.

The school board has stood firm and tight-lipped on the decision. Board member Nickels has continually voiced her support of the administrators and her opposition to the Jan. 12 vote.

Applications for the four initial recall petitions were filed with the city Feb. 23. The four petitions, all worded the same, essentially based their grounds for recall on an alleged improper closed-session meeting before the Jan. 12 vote and a failure to comply with board policies in evaluating and the retention or non-retention of employees. The petition aimed at Nickels, dated March 2, copied verbatim the grounds from the other four petitions.

Carmill Goldsberry, the sponsor of the fifth petition, said she filed the application out of a sense of fairness. "The first petition was attacking the executive session and the legality of it, and all five board members participated," she said.

Assuming that all five petitions have the required number of signatures from qualified

City of Nome registered voters, the request to set a recall election date for all the board members could go before the Nome Common Council as soon as March 22, according to City Clerk Sandy Babcock. State law requires that an election be scheduled between 45 and 75 days of the petitions' submission to the council.

Babcock said the earliest an election could likely occur would be around the third week of May. She noted, however, that a vote would likely get scheduled a little further out since the city needs to receive clearance from the U.S. Department of Justice to conduct the election.

Babcock said the federal clearance is required whenever an election is scheduled outside the dates set up in the city's ordinances to ensure the elections are run properly. Babcock said the clearance could take four to six week to obtain. With that in mind, she said a letter would be sent to the DOJ as soon as the petitions' signatures were verified. "The letter is going to go off right away, even before the [Nome Common Council] meeting," she said.

Meanwhile, an election committee made up of a mix of school board members, teachers, community members and district personnel have been interviewing candidates for the Nome-Beltz administrator positions during the first two weeks of March. Both Sullivan and Boyer had reapplied for their jobs, but were deemed ineligible by Superintendent Jon Wehde.

At a board work session Feb. 23, Wehde said his decision to not include the two in the interviews was based on the school board's vote to not renew their contracts. "Presently I find that the two past employees are not eligible by virtue of being not renewed. I don't know of any legal precedent to allow me to approach the board and make that recommendation," Wehde said. "I have not been pressured or threatened. I have to find the generic truth...whether I like it or not." Wehde had initially recommended that the board renew the administrators' contracts.

One member of the interview committee, community member Mark Johnson, addressed the board at the Feb. 23 work session to voice his concern that none of the candidates being looked at for the positions lived in Nome.

The board was to hold its regular meeting a day late in March to accommodate the members' schedules. The Nugget went to press before the meeting, slated for March 10, could be held.

Pilgrim, owned by the Catholic diocese of Northern Alaska, was up for auction to the highest bidder as part of CBNA's bankruptcy proceedings.

Lawyers on behalf of Nomeites Nancy and Louie Green had filed a quiet title action case, asserting that they own the property through a real estate law dubbed adverse possession. The Greens have thus far been unsuccessful at staying the sale of the property.

According to the U.S. Bankruptcy court clerk, there were only two bids submitted. A newly formed entity called Unaatuq Inc., owned by Bering Straits Native Corp., Sitnasuak Native Corp., Kawerak Inc.,

Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. (a Community Development Quota entity), White Mountain Native Corp., Teller and Mary's Igloo Native corporations was the successful bidder in the March 5 auction facilitated by the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Anchorage. The court rejected the bid of Chena Power Group, saying that the bid did not comply with all requirements.

In a statement, BSNC said that it has long sought an interest in the Pilgrim property as the land is sandwiched between BSNC land and Mary's Igloo properties. "The property has tremendous cultural and historical significance for the residents of the region and many families trace their ancestry to relatives who were raised at the Catholic orphanage," reads a BSNC press release.

BSNC's chief executive officer Gail Schubert said in the statement that the acquisition of the property is a victory, and that Pilgrim is now back under the stewardship of stakeholders from the Bering Strait region. Without going into details how the land will be used in the future, or what Unaatuq's plans are, Schubert said that it has great potential as a place of cultural renewal and healing, and agricultural and geothermal development.

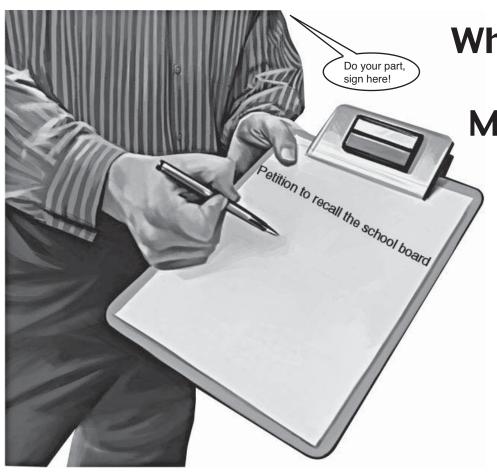

The sale of Pilgrim Hot Springs was part of the requirements to comply with CBNA's bankruptcy plan. The Catholic diocese filed for Chapter 11 in 2008 when nearly 200 sexual abuse victims came forward with civil court cases against the church and a dozen of Catholic priests and lay workers who worked in missions in rural Alaska. The cases alleged sexually abuse of children of all ages in a time span from the 1960s to the late 1980s.

Although the request for stay of the Pilgrim sale was denied, the U.S. District Court issued an order March 9 that allowed Green's appeal of the decision go forward.

Owens loses appeal in Ivanoff murder case

By Sandra L. Medearis

The state appeals court ruled March 3 that former Nome police officer Matt Owens would continue to serve his 99-year sentence without a new trial. In 2005, a Kotzebue jury found Owens guilty of killing Sonia Ivanoff on Aug. 11, 2003 and tampering with evidence in the murder investigation.

Owens was on the Nome police force when a volunteer searcher found the missing young woman's body, with a single shot through the head, near a gold dredge a few miles from Nome.

Superior Court Judge Ben Esch moved the trial to Kotzebue after a weeks-long trial in Nome ended with a hung jury that failed to return a verdict. The Kotzebue jury found Owens guilty on the first-degree murder and evidence tampering. Owens received a sentence of 99 years and is currently in prison.

Owens appealed that verdict on several points. Owens said Esch erred in not moving the trial from Kotzebue. Owens said Esch erred in not granting him a new trial. Owens said the evidence did not support his convictions.

The Alaska Court of Appeals issued a memorandum and judgment March 3 upholding the findings of the Kotzebue court and Esch's rulings.

Owens' attorney said the jury's verdict went too far away from the insufficient evidence prosecutors presented during the trial.

"The venue in this case was improper, but more important, the evidence was insufficient," said Ralph Cushman, who presented Owens' case before the appellate court judges.

Cushman went on to analyze testimony from Dealy Blackshear, Charlotte Calandrelli, Florence Habros, and evidence from a fire where state investigators said they found remnants of Ivanoff's clothing and keys belonging to Owens' uncle and others. One fire-damaged key was similar to a key to Ivanoff's apartment. The key would fit into that lock, but would not turn.

The appeal court arguments attempted to throw doubt on the state's case that Owens killed Ivanoff and later, Sept. 23, 2003, staged a stolen police car incident in the area including a note from the killer. Cushman's arguments raised the question that another police officer could have committed the crimes or a killer had framed Owens.

'No reasonable juror could find that Owens was the killer from the evidence on that night.' Cushman told the court, according to documents. "There's no indication it was him as opposed to Officer Piscoya. Both had unaccounted for time." The night of the murder, Owens and Officer Stan Piscova were on duty.

Cushman said Habros, who identified a police car she said Ivanoff entered the night of the murder, could not have been sure of the description on a dark and rainy night. Additionally, when asked seven weeks later, Habros could not recall other details of the incident, Cushman said.

A primary issue on sufficiency of evidence, according to Cushman, was what evidence corroborated witness Dealy Blackshear's report that was admitted as inconsistent statement that Calandrelli told him in a hospital hallway that she had walked in on Owens and seen him with the victim's ID and wallet. "Was it recorded? Was it said to a reliable reporter, such as an investigative officer or a treating physician?" Cushman asked. Cushman called Blackshear's statement "patently false on its face."

Calandrelli on the witness stand later denied the statement. Owens lived in the Calandrelli home. Both were employees, as was Ivanoff, at Norton Sound Regional Hospital.

Eric A. Ringsmuth, assistant attorney general for the state's case, said the inconsistencies had been thoroughly pointed out to the jury, and that these witnesses were among 80 witnesses in the trial.

Ringsmuth told the appellate court that Owens' arguments interpreted the evidence in his favor rather than that of the state. He said the weight of all the evidence taken together weighed against the reversal of Owens' conviction.

Owens' arguments "lack merit and do not justify this court reversing Owens' convictions," Ringsmuth said.

The appellate court does not properly analyze evidence, Cushman acknowledged. [The tape of the arguments reveals analyses by Owens to lighten the amount of evidence on the scale, by discrediting it, to cause the court to agree that there was insufficient evidence to convict him in the Kotzebue trial.l

The appellate court found that there was sufficient evidence to convict Owens and that the guilty verdicts did not amount to a miscarriage of justice.

After a grand jury indicted Owens, he moved to transfer the trial from Nome to Anchorage. Esch denied Owens' motion. Owens' first trial, in Nome. ended with a hung jury. Owens again moved to transfer venue to Anchorage or Fairbanks. Judge Esch, according to court documents, concluded that the combination of the initial pretrial publicity in Nome, coupled with the publicity from the first trial, created a substantial risk that Owens would not receive a fair trial if the case were retried in Nome. However, he concluded that, rather than change venue to Anchorage or Fairbanks, he would change the venue to Kotzebue, in the same judicial district as Nome. Esch reasoned, according to documents, that a jury from Kotzebue would be drawn from a community similar to Nome where the crime occurred. He stated, according to court documents, that he was familiar with both communities and was aware that neither the Nome newspaper nor Nome radio stations were primary sources of news in Kotzebue. He concluded that he could rely on the jury questioning to measure any possible prejudice in Kotzebue.

Following jury examination in Kotzebue, Owens again asked for a change of venue. Esch denied the motion.

In his appeal, Owens contended that Esch made a mistake in not allowing him to individually question each juror out of the presence of other jurors. Esch had had each juror fill out a questionnaire before going up to be questioned, allowing them to bring up sensitive issues without revealing them publicly, according to the appeals memorandum. In addition, Esch allowed Owens to conduct individualized questioning of 85 of the potential jurors outside the presence of other potential jurors. He also gave Owens six extra peremptory challenges.

The appeals court upheld Esch on the jury issue: "We conclude that Judge Esch did not abuse his discretion in conducting the jury voir dire [questioning under oath of a juror to determine competency or suitability to serve].

Citing other case law, the appeals court found that Esch did not err in denying a change of venue.

"The record does show that some of the potential jurors in Kotzebue were familiar with witnesses in the case," the March 3 appeals court memorandum said. "But it appears that from the jury voir dire in Kotzebue, Judge Esch could properly conclude that the jury ultimately selected was impartial."

The Alaska Court of Appeals affirmed the actions of the Alaska Superior Court Second District in the Owens case and ruled that Esch did not abuse his discretion in his handling of the case.

Murder trial in Teller baby death set for June

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Alaska Superior Court in Nome has set a trial date for Frank D. Lee of Teller on charges relating to the "shaken baby" death of his 7month-old son, Harley Dickson.

Jury selection will begin the morning of June 15.

Judge Ben Esch directed that a time block of eight days for the jury trial be placed on the Second District calendar after seven or so months of motions and court proceedings to get the indictment dismissed following the arrest of Lee when a grand jury handed up the indictment on July 17 last summer.

The indictment charged Lee on Murder One and Murder Two in incidents "on or between" June 8 to Oct. 11 2008, according to court documents, that resulted in the baby's death Oct. 13, 2008. The indictment followed a nine months' investigation by law enforcement.

According to the indictment, Lee "knowingly engaged in conduct directed towards a child under 16 and with criminal negligence inflicted serious injury on the child by at least two separate acts, and one of the acts resulted in the death of the child."

Shaken Baby Syndrome is a form of child abuse where the abuser violently shakes a baby or small child creating a whiplash motion causing accelerationdeceleration injuries that can lead to death or severe brain injuries.

In mid-February, Esch denied a third motion by Lee to get the indictment dismissed.

This motion dealt with an investigator not enumerating to the grand jury all the interviews of Lee following the death. Lee said the omission of the interview robbed him of exculpatory information. Exculpatory describes evidence that tends to justify or exonerate an accused person's actions and tends to show that they had a lack of criminal intent.

According to court documents, Alaska State Troopers interviewed Lee on two occasions (Troopers Sears and Bucknall) and so did an Anchorage Police Department Officer Patrick Roberts. The grand jury heard the AST interviews, but Mark Granda, AST investigator, did not mention the interview with Roberts. In his motion for dismissal, Lee based his motion on the alleged failure to present exculpatory information to the grand jury or, because Granda made a material misstatement to the grand jury.

Because of these alleged failures, according to court documents filed by Lee, the grand jury was left with the impression that they had all the evidence Lee was willing to provide to medical and police personnel, that Lee's consistent denial from the day Harley Dickson entered the hospital to eight months later of any involvement in the baby's death was not provided the grand jury. The state has argued that all three interviews produced the same, except that in one interview Lee denied drinking.

Granda testified that Lee was interviewed in Anchorage after the medivac and then subsequently "here [Nome] in July."

A grand juror then asked, "but there was no additional information provided, is that correct, Trooper?"

The witness said that was correct. In other cases, Esch noted in his denial, it has been established that a prosecutor has a duty as the grand jury's legal advisor, to present exculpatory evidence to a grand jury, to aid the grand jury in exercising its responsibility to seek out exculpatory evidence if such evidence exists.

In the denial, Esch said that the omitted exculpatory evidence here is not evidence of a nature that tends, in and of itself, to negate his guilt. The omitted evidence was merely the fact that defendant Lee gave another statement to APD before he gave a statement in Anchorage to Trooper Bucknall.

"The statement given to Officer Roberts was consistent with Lee's statements to Trooper Sears or Investigator Bucknall. [Lee] stated that he found the child in its bed sometime after 11 p.m. in distress with a white material coming out of its mouth and/or nose," Esch wrote in the denial of Lee's motion to dismiss the indictment. "The child was limp, he picked it up, he called for help and attempted to provide respiratory assistance until the health aide(s) arrived.

"There was nothing in the statement to Roberts [statement unknown to grand iuryl that tended, in and of itself, to negate guilt in any fashion differently than the statements to Bucknall or Sears. The prosecutor does not violate the duty to present exculpatory evidence if the omitted evidence is cumulative."

Therefore, the court dismissed Lee's motion to dismiss the indictment.

A calendar call for attorneys to prepare for the trial has been set for the afternoon of March 22.

that Stroebele fired on the victim after Amaktoolik refused to drop the rifle and instead pointed it at the Trooper. "The Trooper didn't have time to do anything but say, 'Put down the weapon.' There wasn't anything other than that. Then he had to take action," Holloway said March 5.

Holloway was in Nome late last week to oversee the Troopers' handling of the matter.

According to Holloway, Stroebele was in Golovin March 3 to act on a court order that Amaktoolik be escorted to Nome and then Anchorage to receive treatment for an ongoing mental illness. He was not being sought for any alleged criminal activity.

Holloway said Stroebele and a behavioral health aide arrived via snowmachine at the family residence where Amaktoolik was staying. He said Amaktoolik exited the house with the rifle as soon as Stroebele and the health aide arrived. Holloway said Stroebele only had time to step off the snowmachine and order Amaktoolik to drop the weapon before the rifle was pointed at him. "The Trooper then shoots him. As soon as he can, he goes to him and tries to render aid," Holloway said.

Holloway said the two men were approximately 20 to 25 feet away from each other when Stroebele fired his standard-issue 40-calibur Glock, fatally wounding Amaktoolik. The victim had been alone at the residence.

Per Troopers' policy, the fatal shooting has spurred an investigation by the Alaska Bureau of Investigation. "The investigation is ongoing. We have to compile everything," Holloway said. "We will do a shooting review board to make sure we did everything correctly. Right now we are at the criminal investigation stage. We have to find out why this shooting death occurred."

Holloway said the investigation is still pending results of an autopsy and toxicology tests, a process that he said could take a couple of months. Holloway said once the investigation is complete, it will be up to the district attorney and office of special prosecutions whether any charges are warranted. Holloway said so far the investigation has been straightforward. "There's not a whole lot of surprises," he said.

Holloway said the investigation is progressing as quickly and thoroughly as possible. "We know that these things are hard on the villages. It's hard on the family," he said. "Part of the reason we try to get these things investigated as soon as we can is so the family can get some closure. So they can ask questions."

Family seeks answers

Eleanor Amaktoolik, Joseph Amaktoolik's sister, still has questions. "To this day I don't even know what the Trooper side of the story is," she said March 8 by phone from Golovin. "I don't even know what is going on right now."

Eleanor Amaktoolik said her brother suffered from schizophrenia and had stopped taking his medication before the March 3 incident. She said his condition had steadily deteriorated as he stopped eating and sleeping and began saying unintelligible things as he lost his grip on re"No one can say it didn't affect me, because it always affects you. It's a serious matter. No one ever wants to take somebody else's life."

- Alaska State Trooper Director Col. Audie Holloway

ality. "He couldn't tell reality from illusion. He just didn't know the difference," she said.

Eleanor Amaktoolik had contacted the village-based mental health counselor to seek help for her brother. According to Holloway, that request led to Norton Sound Health Corp.'s Behavioral Health Services department receiving an order from a Nome judge that Joseph Amaktoolik be taken to the Alaska Psychiatric Institute in Anchorage for evaluation. "There was a court order for the Trooper to escort him from Golovin to Nome, because Joe wouldn't go willingly," Eleanor Amaktoolik said. "We all knew he wouldn't go."

Although she did not call them, Eleanor Amaktoolik said she was aware the Troopers were coming for her brother. With Joseph Amaktoolik in his distressed state of mind, Eleanor Amaktoolik said the Troopers should not have approached the house. "We really feel it was handled wrong, especially with a schizophrenic," she said. "Knowing that he was very angry, they shouldn't have went down there."

Holloway said the Troopers did not have reason to believe an encounter with Joseph Amaktoolik would be violent. According to the Alaska Court System's online database, Amaktoolik had sporadically accumulated a few charges against him from the state over the years, however, none were for violent offenses. "We had picked up Joseph in the past and never had any problems," he said. "People change over time; you can't tell what somebody's going to do. You have to be careful when you approach, and the Trooper didn't have the opportunity to do anything else."

Holloway said it was after the fact that Amaktoolik's anger was revealed. "We recovered some writing from him. We found out he was really upset when his sister told him the Troopers were coming to town," he said. "He didn't want to go back and take care of his mental problems. When the Trooper got there, the Trooper didn't know he was upset."

Eleanor Amaktoolik said Troopers had previously escorted her brother out for mental health treatment a couple of years ago. She said he had spent approximately a year in treatment in Anchorage before coming home. "When he was on his medicine, he was fine," she said. "But he wasn't on his medication."

Even before word got out about the shooting, Eleanor Amaktoolik said she knew something was wrong when she called her brother's house and the Trooper answered the phone. "He kept saying my brother couldn't go to the phone," she said.

She said she was warned against coming down to the home and was told she would be arrested if she did show up. "I was the one who called for help to come down here and help me to bring him there [to Nome] to a hospital," she said. "I'm not trying to be disrespectful, being the one to call and ask for help."

The Troopers said the area around the house had to be treated as a crime scene

"It's not something that you ever want to do."

Holloway said that while an investigation continues in the matter, preliminary indications are that Stroebele acted properly. "At this stage in the game, it very much looks like the Trooper did his job extremely well. He was forced to take this action and probably saved his life and [the counselor's] life," Holloway said.

Holloway acknowledged the profound effect a shooting produces in all directions—from the Trooper, to the family to the community. "I don't know of anyone who is not affected by having to do something like this. It's a stressful event. It's not something that you ever want to do," Holloway said. "No one can say it didn't affect me, because it always affects you. It's a serious matter. No one ever wants to take somebody else's life."

Head of the Nome post Sgt. Andrew Merrill said, as far as he knew, Trooper Stroebele, who has been a Trooper for six years, had never fired his weapon in the line of duty. He also could not recall anytime that Troopers were required to use deadly force in the region.

Holloway said support for a Trooper involved in a shooting is taken seriously. "Our first duty is to investigate it and make sure the law has not been broken," he said. "But we also have another duty, and that's to our employee and an employee who works for all of us. They don't just work for the Troopers, they work for the community, they work for the public, they work for all Alaskans. We make sure they get the support mentally."

Holloway said the Trooper involved in the shooting is required to go through a mental health screening afterward to make certain they are OK after the event. Holloway said Trooper Stroebele will be able to go back on duty.

A cloud over the community

Eleanor Amaktoolik said her brother's death has been hard on the family and community. "It was devastating. Everyone was devastated. Nobody expected this," she said. "It feels like a big cloud is over us, and we're dealing with it the best we can."

The Troopers say they recognize the impact of such an event can be monumental in a small village. "We didn't want this to happen," Merrill said. "We were coming down to try and get Joseph some help, and unfortunately it just didn't happen the way we wanted it to."

Merrill and Holloway said they were appreciative of the community's help, despite their grief and shock, in aiding with the investigation. "The community was very supportive in light of what happened," Merrill said. "Family members were distraught but also supportive in helping us get the investigation done."

Holloway echoed those thoughts. "We owe them thanks for helping us and supporting us. Our thoughts are with the family too. It is a difficult situation to have to deal with," he said.

Meanwhile in Golovin, a funeral was planned for March 10 for Joseph Amaktoolik, pending the state's release of his remains following the autopsy. Beyond the grief of losing a family member, Eleanor Amaktoolik said she has to bear the pain of somehow feeling responsible since she made the initial call to try and get her brother help. "I have a whole world of guilt," she said.

But she said she also has help as Golovin comes together to take care of their own. "I've got a whole village of support," she said.

There are no mushers from the immediate Nome area, but Unalakleet's mediate Nome a William "Middie" Johnson is running the Iditarod for the first time. Johnson received the $10,000 Leonard Seppala Heritage grant in August and is now putting it to use. He said his team consists of dogs from lineages from former Iditarod musher Fred Sagoonick, from his own family's dogs and a few from Baker. Johnson's story has been widely picked up by the media as he has direct ties to the 1925 Serum Run. His grandfather, Henry Ivanoff, took part in the famous dog team relay from Nenana to the Gold Rush City, delivering serum to diphtheria-stricken Nome. Ivanoff handed the serum over to Leonard Seppala on Norton Bay, in the midst of a brutal snowstorm.

At the staging area on Willow Lake, dog trucks were parked in the starting order of their dog teams, with fans, race officials and reporters crowding around their favorite musher. Mushers were relieved that the day has finally come to get on the trail and make all those months of training, strategy plotting and taking care of food drops and other logistics pay off. A change of guard was noticeable with former Nomeite Aaron Burmeister taking a leave and sporting a handler instead of a musher badge on his arm. Some of his dogs however are going to Nome as part of Dallas Seavey's team. King, who just finished in fourth place at the Fur Rondy world championship sprint race with a leased team from the winning Streeper Kennel in Canada, has widely announced that this might be his last race to Nome. Also absent from the race line up were Kotzebue's Ed Iten and Akiak's Mike Williams Sr. Instead, their sons Quinn Iten, 18, and Mike Williams Jr., 25, took the baton and are running this year's race. In both cases, the fathers would've liked to be in the race with their sons-rather than watching their progress from afar-but the costs of fielding two teams and having a large enough kennel to raise two competitive teams are outrageous these days, especially in bush Alaska.

It has been a while since Ramie Redington, son of the Iditarod founder Joe Redington Sr., ran the Race, but the Yukon Quest winner Hans Gatt. Gatt managed to pass Mackey in the last stretches of the race and powered to the finish line in a record time. Mackey and third place Hugh Neff also shattered the Quest's previous record, set by Sebastian Schnuelle last year.

Quest finisher with a team of Gatt's dogs and this year's Mackey apprentice was Jamaican Newton Marshall. Marshall leased a team of dogs from Mackey and was also mentored by the three-time Iditarod champion. In an effort to continue the "cool running" recognition that Caribbean and Jamaican winter sport athletes are not a contradiction in itself, Marshall has an agency sending out press releases on his behalf with the slogan "Rootin' for Newton." The Jamaica dogsled team is sponsored by world famous Jimmy Buffett and Margaritaville, the Jamaican tourism board and various companies in the travel industry.

Tight win against Barrow nets boys third title

In what has come down to a season defined by two teams in the Western Conference of Alaska Class 3A basketball, the Nome Nanooks evened its series against Barrow on Friday in Unalaska. This win, however, came with a bigger prize than the previous three meetings—a regional championship.

The win, the Nanooks' third in a row, earns the boys a trip to the state tournament next week in Anchorage.

Nome was led by Jeremy Head's 32 points and 12 rebounds in Friday's 63-60 win over Barrow. Mason Evans added 17, eight of which came from his perfect performance from the free-throw line. Christian Leckband added a dozen points for the Nanooks while Mikey Wongittilin sunk two critical free-throws late in the game.

Barrow, who had a four-point lead at the half, was led by Daniel Thomas with 15. Thomas was backed up by Tyler Adams and Victor Unatoa, who each had 14 points.

A Nanook-Whaler rematch could very well happen again next week in Anchorage for a state title. Barrow picked up its ticket to state after defeating Bethel in the consolation match. The top two teams from the regional tournament are allowed to advance to state.

Nome's win against Barrow put the two teams at an even 2-2 for the season. The Whalers handed Nome its first of only three total losses for the season during an early meeting in Anchorage. Nome split a two-game series with the Whalers on Barrow's home court in February. Nome's only other loss for the season came at the hands of Class 4A Dimond.

For more than a decade the regional title has gone to either Barrow or Nome. Prior to Nome's trio of titles, Barrow held the honor for nine out of 10 years, from 1997-1998 season to 2006-2007. It would have been a perfect decade for Barrow ex-

Lady Nanooks battle back to earn state berth

They didn't do it the easy way, but the Lady Nanooks showed enough grit and talent to earn a spot at next week's state basketball tournament after battling its way to second place in the Western Conference Tournament in Unalaska last week.

Nome's long route to a state berth came to an end on Saturday when the Lady Nanooks won the second-place game against Bethel. Led by Devynn Johnson's 21 points, Nome took control of the game down the stretch to win 46-33. Nome and Bethel each had 20 points on the board at half time. The Lady Nanooks, however, were able to outscore Bethel 26-13 in the second half of the game.

Richelle Horner poured in 12 points in the effort. Iris Warnke-

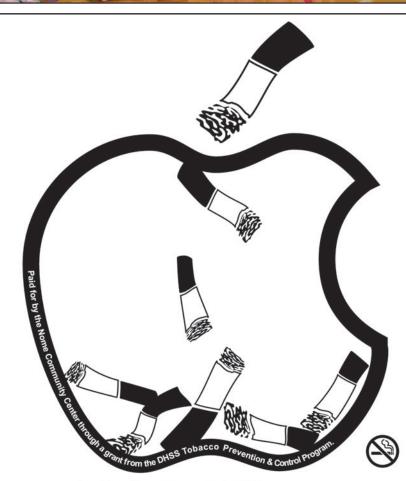

Green and Hilary Stiles each scored five. Liz Sherman-Luce notched two points and Renee Lammer sank one free-throw. Bethel was led by Audrey Leary who scored a baker's dozen. She was backed up by Lauren Forbes with eight.

Nome had to earn its way to the runner-up game by defeating Dillingham earlier in the day. Results of that game were unavailable.

Nome kicked off the tournament with a strong 55-30 win against Hooper Bay on March 3. Lammer had the hot hand in the game, putting up 17 points on the board. Johnson also had a double-digit game, scoring an even 10. The trio

QUEEN OF THE DANCE (above)—Janet Noongwook performs a welcome dance at the region's 2A Conference Championships in Savoonga last week

Point Hope, Noatak and Noorvik send teams to state

It isn't often that teams from the Northwest Arctic or North Slope areas travel to St. Lawrence Island for basketball games. In fact, it's never happened before.

This year, though, the Great Northwest Conference Basketball Tournament was held in Savoonga, and 18 teams arrived safely to begin the competition March 3.

The top-seeded Point Hope boys and Noorvik girls arrived with impressive records but also knowing that they had big targets on their backs. The rest of the teams, four from the Northwest Arctic region and four from the Bering Strait School District had intentions to grab one of the two state tournament slots.

The games went to form the first day with top-seeded teams winning. The Unalakleet Wolfpack boys pulled a mild upset in their dismantling of the Noorvik Bears, 70-47. A dominant performance by senior captain Pete Katongan led the young Wolfpack to a big first-round win.

The March 4 games also favored the top-seeded teams with one exception as the Selawik Lady Wolves beat the Northern Lights from Shishmaref. The Point Hope Harpoonerettes had all they could handle from a talented Noatak Lynx team, but pulled ahead in the waning minutes to escape with a one-point win, 54-53, to advance to the championship game.

In the "True Second" tournament format, the championship games are played on Friday night and the top two seeds in each bracket had earned spots in them. The girls looked exceptionally intriguing with the Noorvik Bears defending their top spot against an always formidable Point Hope team, with lots of big game experience. As expected the game was a seesaw affair with stars like Erin Zibell and Lindsey Wells answering each thrust by Point Hope standouts like Donna Nash and Michelle Lane with parries of their own. In the end the Bears survived 43-40 to claim the championship.

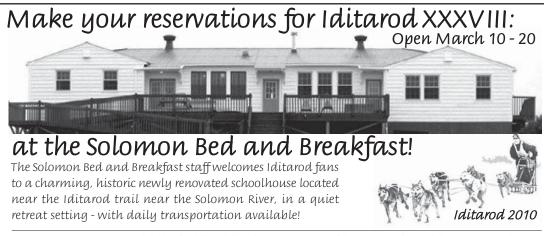

The boys game was similar as the underdog Lynx from Noatak scratched and clawed their way in an even contest until the final minutes when the experience and confidence of the Point Hope boys surfaced and they stamped their ticket to Anchorage.

Saturday is "survival day" in this format. Every game is an elimination game. The Unalakleet boys stepped up big to win a morning game versus Selawik, then an afternoon game against Buckland before succumbing to the rested and very athletic Noatak boys. The Point Hope ladies waited to see who would fight their way back to the "true second" game and ended up meeting the Lynx from Noatak again and won another very tough game 47-42.

Savoonga School and the community were wonderful hosts, providing an evening of wonderful Eskimo dancing, refreshments, plenty of muktuk and support of all the visiting teams. They will all be cheering the four teams who will represent the 2A conference in Anchorage at the state championships.

cept for Nome's title in 2000-2001.

Nome's route to the title this year started with a lopsided 91-20 win over Hooper Bay March 3. Nome blasted out of the gate with a 30-point first quarter and never looked back. Worn down by the fourth, Hooper Bay failed to put a point on the board in the final quarter.

Head notched 22 points in the effort, followed by Leckband's 18. Jode Babcock added 10 points; Nathan Blandford put up eight points; Tim Sullivan, Derek Wieler, and Dominique Hall scored six; David Stickel scored five; Brendan Wehde scored four and Jeremiah Johnson scored two.

The Nanooks came back the next day with another strong performance against Bethel, winning 82-49. Head again led the way for Nome with 29 points, nearly perfect from the field at 13-14. Leckband was again strong inside putting up a dozen points. Evans scored six points and delivered a dozen assists in the win.

In addition to the regional title, the Nanooks were honored with the academic award for the team with the highest grade point average. Head, Sullivan, Evans and Leckband were all named to the all-tournament team. Sullivan also cleaned up in the side competitions, winning the hot-shot, free-throw and three-point competitions.

Nome is slated to kickoff the state tournament at the Sullivan Arena in Anchorage March 15 at 11:30 a.m. against Cordova. In addition to Barrow, other teams competing will be Glennallen, Mt. Edgecumbe, Haines, Galena and Barrow.

Girls

of Horner, Warnke-Green and Stiles each scored seven. Sherman-Luce scored three.

The momentum off that first win was not enough to carry the Lady Nanooks through their next game against Barrow March 4. The Lady Whalers took the game and went on to defeat Bethel in the final to win at least their fifth conference championship in a row. Bethel's loss in that match put them into the consolation game.

Nome continued the tournament Friday with a win against Kotzebue.

The two teams had split their two earlier games in the season.

In addition to the second-place trophy, the Lady Nanooks were honored with three of its members named to the all-tournament team. Horner, Johnson and Lammer all made the cut. Sherman-Luce also won some accolades as the tournament's hot-shot champion.

The Lady Nanooks will start the state championship March 15 in Anchorage's Sullivan Arena with a 5 p.m. game against ACS. Also playing in the tourney will be Barrow, Cordova, Glennallen, Mt. Edgecumbe, Sitka and Monroe.

Using a Home Monitor to Achieve a Healthy Blood Pressure

High blood pressure is a silent killer. It can persist for years unnoticed, doing its damage gradually before any symptoms develop. Research shows that people who recognize the threat and take appropriate measures to keep their blood pressure in a healthy range significantly reduce their risk of having a heart attack, suffering a stroke, or developing kidney failure.

In recent years, home blood pressure machines have become an affordable tool for people to monitor their blood pressure at home. Most of these easyto-use devices function like a blood pressure machine in a doctor's office and provide accurate readings with the push of a button. Quality machines are available on the Internet, at most pharmacies, and in most large department

Using these home devices can provide valuable information to you and your provider because, unlike the readings at a doctor's office, a home monitor can provide multiple readings throughout the day in various settings, giving a more accurate picture of your average blood pressure over time. Having home readings available for your provider can be especially helpful if you are one of the many people who develop an artificially elevated blood pressure only when visiting the doctor's office or medical clinic, a condition called "white coat hypertension."

To some extent, everyone's blood pressure is susceptible to the effects of a visit to the doctor. Without additional blood pressure readings, patients and providers could be forced into making major medical decisions about lifelong medications based solely on readings obtained in an understandably stressful environment. By contrast, a home record gives your provider a more accurate picture of your average pressure readings from day to day. These readings can then be used to make informed decisions about specific ways to manage your blood pressure.

Many people also find that the home monitor is educational. The monitor provides instant feedback regarding how a person's blood pressure responds to exercise, stress, salty foods, and quality sleep (or lack thereof).

When using a home monitor, it is important to keep a log or diary of your readings. Some patients use a small notebook for this purpose. Others find it helpful to set up a personalized spreadsheet on their computer or download applications for their smart phone. The way you keep the blood pressure log is not as important as the record itself. Sound medical decisions can be made just as safely from data off a scrap of paper as from a professional spreadsheet. It is important to include the time of day the reading was obtained and any associated factors ("Just exercised" or "Ate pizza last night").

Blood pressure is recorded as two numbers. The top number, called systolic pressure, is the pressure when the heart is pumping blood forward through the vessels. The bottom number, called diastolic pressure, is the pressure in between beats when the heart is at rest.

According to the American Heart Association, a healthy blood pressure goal is lower than 140/90 for an otherwise healthy individual. A lower goal of 130/80 is recommended by the AHA and the National Kidney Foundation for anyone with known heart disease, history of brain vessel disease, or signs of kidney disease. The lower goal of 130/80 is also recommended by the American Diabetes Association because diabetes is considered a cardiovascular disease equivalent by most experts.

Blood pressure management should always begin with appropriate lifestyle management. If your pressure is high, consider increasing daily physical activity, decreasing the sodium in your diet, and increasing the variety of vegetables consumed daily. If medication is needed, your provider can review the risks and benefits of the many blood pressure medications available to help further lower the blood pressure and protect against organ damage. Patients should never make changes regarding their medications based on home blood pressure readings alone without consulting their provider. The home monitor is meant to enhance, not replace, the face-to-face medical exam.

Following your blood pressure over time is one of the most important ways to track the condition of your heart, brain, and kidneys. A home blood pressure monitor can be an affordable tool for improving this vital part of your

Wedding Bells

On Februrary 15, 2010, Kendra Kookruk Nichols and Silas Jason Takak were married in a private ceremony on Waimanalo Beach, Oahu, Hawaii. Their service was officiated by co-pastors of Nome's Community Methodist Church, David Elmore and Julie Yoder Elmore.

Kendra is the daughter of the late Renard and Linda Nichols of Nome. Silas is son of Jessie and Gabriel Takak, Sr. of Nome.

The ceremony began with the Hawaiian Wedding Song performed by Danny Kiaha with ukulele. Parents of the groom entered the chapel in the sand, the matron-of-honor, Christina Agloinga followed carrying the honorary flower girl Jocelyn Nichols. The bride walked over an orchid filled pathway escorted down the aisle by her eldest sister Darcy Verdin. Best man Gabriel Takak, Sr. stood in support next to the groom. The couple will continue to live in Nome and raise their family.

There will be a reception in Nome at their campsite near Cape Nome in June 2010.

seum and loved it. It was one of the most interesting jobs I ever had and one in which I learned something every day, be it from some historical source in the museum or from Laura Samuelson, the director. How fortunate Nome is to have someone of her caliber and knowledge. I enjoyed working with Laura. The atmosphere was always very pleasant and that extended to the visitors.

Perhaps when the new museum is built, I can come and help out in the setting up of it. That would be great. And I am also (now) physically capable of doing so, plus my head is filled with many ideas.

Nancy, keep up with your great newspaper. Your editorial is the first thing I read in each issue. You are in a way, the backbone of the commu-

I sure miss Nome. I have a lot of happy memories of the city and all the nice people I've met there.

Sincerely. Venus Lamb Soldotna, AK 99669

Dear Nancy,

Recently Mark Begich our Senator met with Veterans in Anchorage and with Alaskan Veterans on the road system. Wonder what benefits were discussed? Alaska has the highest number of veterans per capita. We in rural Alaska were not notified.

I applied for compensation with the Disabled American Veterans Department of Alaska. I applied or filed claims against the Navy because I have stage four cancer of the colon. Out of five stages for possible treatment which I am undergoing, chemotherapy and radiation are the only option because the tumor can't be removed through surgery.

I filed against the Navy because of my M.O.A. about the U.S.S. Kitty Hawk-CVA-63. I was aboard for three and a half months working in the boiler room. Insulation on super heated steam pipes, valves and joints were all asbestos. No warnings on protection devices were used against this toxic material in fiber or cloth

Black crude oil was the fuel used to make it a more toxic workplace. Stack gas was always there.

Disabled Veterans of Alaska Veterans in Fairbanks referred me to the Disabled Americans in Anchorage. Department Service Officer gave me a contact which was a facsimile number. The Department of Veterans Affairs also sent an unsigned letter delaying further action (also from Anchorage)

In July 2009, Linda Boisseau of Disabled American Veterans Department of Alaska came to Golovin to meet with eight veterans. We were told that Vietnam Veto had a blanket on all benefits. We were only qualified for a tombstone.

A veteran whom I served with aboard the Kitty Hawk-CVA63 was so frustrated by that remark. He asked the presiding Veterans Affairs person —"You want us to pick a date to die?"

I registered with Selective Service at age 18 in Oregon and was considered 4F after a physical in 1962, which means I had a disability. But in 1967 I was attending school in Oakland and I received a letter from Selective Service saying they changed my status to 1A-1A, eligible for the draft without a complete physical - so I volunteered.

The past Editor Albro Gregory honored all the veterans no matter which branch they served with their orders after boot camp. The Nome Nugget Editor Albro Gregory honored veterans duties and announced their orders in the Nome Nugget.

I am writing this letter because of the way Alaskan veterans are being neglected.

I salute all Alaskan veterans especially the Vietnam veterans. We were proud to serve. In rural Alaska, not on the road system.

Thank you Nancy. Respectfully, Harry V. Boone Golovin, AK 99762

TOWN HALL MEETING - Representative Neil Foster took time to visit Nome Friday afternoon for an informal town meeting to talk with Nomeites about issues of concern. Shown to his right is Tom Vaden who expressed ideas about energy conservation and gas production. Other issues dealt with the state office building being kept on Front Street, emergency oxygen transport, mail delivery etc.

Foster's Juneau Report

Operating Budget Moves to Full Finance Committee By Rep. Neal Foster

The House takes the lead on the Operating and Mental Health Budgets while the Senate takes the lead on the Capital Budget. Individual funding requests from Municipalities and other organizations were submitted to the Senate Finance Committee at 5:00 p.m. on Friday. The Senate Finance Committee will be considering the Governor's Proposed Capital Budget and making revisions and adding its own priorities.

With the shorter legislative session budget preparation time has been significantly compressed. House and Senate Finance Committee Members have had a very full schedule which is partly reflected in the difficulty of getting an appointment with committee members.

Legislative Session Passes Midpoint

March 4 was the mid-point of the 90-day session. It was relatively quiet over the last weekend with several legislators attending the Energy Council or returning to their home district for

The Energy Council is comprised of energy producing states and countries and meets yearly to discuss government policies regarding energy and the environment. While the primary concern is fossil fuel production, the council also discusses alternative energy forms. With so much of Alaska's budget dependent upon oil and gas production, it is important that Alaska has a voice in the discussion. The Legislature returns to its normal Schedule on Monday, March 8.

Finance Committee Activity

The House Finance Committee concluded hearings on the House Finance Committee's Operating Budget substitute bill last week and then took up amendments. The Operating Budget funds the day to day operation of State Departments and Agencies, The University of Alaska, and the Alaska Court System. The Operating Budget will be debated on the House Floor and is expected to pass the House this week. From there, it passes on to the Senate which will make the changes that it would like to see. Differences will be resolved in a Joint Conference Committee which will typically take either the House's or the Senate's recommended funding level for an appropriation. Sometimes, the difference will be split.

Grants to Municipalities and other Named Recipients are made through the Capital Budget, which is still in the Senate Finance Committee.

Two of the Governor's major priorities were stripped out of the House version of the budget. One of the top priorities was the Governor's Performance Scholarship Program. Funding for the program would have come from the interest earned by a $400 million set-aside account that the Governor wants to establish.

The second priority was funding for our in-state gas efforts and the ongoing development of a natural gas pipeline. The funding would allow completion of the evaluation of a standalone gas pipeline to deliver natural gas within the state. Another important natural gas issue is the development of smaller fields that could supply local communities in many areas.

Legislation

The deadline for personal legislation was last week. The only bills that may be introduced at this time are those introduced by a committee. There is a substantial backlog of bills to be heard by the Finance Committees. Nearly all bills receive a Finance referral because of the potential cost involved with increased State oversight of individuals and businesses.

House Activity of Interest in the District

The House of Representatives passed House Joint Resolution 46 urging the federal government to support reauthorization of the Denali Commission. The resolution urges Congress and the President to reauthorize the Denali Commission for another five years. The Denali Commission has performed a vital role in providing needed infrastructure in Rural Alaska by improving health facilities, rebuilding fuel storage facilities, upgrading power generation plants and making a whole host of other improvements.

There were several visitors in the office this last week. They included Mary Sattler, former Representative from Bethel, Alice Fitka from St. Michael, Janis (Davena) Ivanoff from Anchorage, Kathy Johnson from Unalakleet, Dora Mae Hughes and Emily Hughes from Teller, Elsie Vaden, Carol Piscoya, Richard Beneville and Loretta Bullard from Nome, Dan Harrelson, from White Mountain, and Doug Griffin and Bill Alstrom from Elim

Visits to the Region

Representative Foster visited Alakanuk last week with Governor Parnell and was in Nome on Friday March 5. There was a public meeting from 5:00 to 7:00 p.m. in the Council Chambers. The purpose of the meeting was to provide people with a chance to meet with the Representative and to discuss issues that are of interest or concern.

Please feel free to contact me or my staff if you have any questions or need any help. The session number is (800) 478-3789. If you are out of the district, the number is (907) 465-I can also be reached by email at Representative_Neal_Foster@ legis.state.ak.us.

Ulu News

By Senator Donald Olson, 26th Alaska Legislature District t

Rural School Tour

On Thursday, February 11, I traveled to three Yukon-Kuskokwim Delta Schools on an official tour with Governor Sean Parnell, Senator Lyman Hoffman, and Representatives Neal Foster and Bob Herron. We visited and saw first-hand the conditions of the educational facilities and learning environments at Alakanuk, Kipnuk and Napaskiak. I spoke with students, teachers, administrators and parents who all heralded the same message of urgently needing more space and equipment. Alakanuk community school is operating at 200 percent capacity with 239 students occupying classrooms designed for 111. The main school buildings are also the oldest in the district built in the 1970s with crumbling foundations and energy-inefficient construction. Alakanuk school is number one on the state's list of projects eligible for grant funding. I am optimistic that the totality of what our group led by the Governor heard and observed on this trip will spawn action and dollar amounts directed at improving these village schools and the learning that takes place within them.

Session's Halfway Point Presses for Decisions

As we hit the halfway point in the current legislative session this week, we face an accelerated work schedule that will change little between now and our April 18 adjournment. The House Finance Committee is in the process of closing out its version of the operating budget, HB 300. In the Senate, the operating budget is about to conclude scrutiny in the subcommittee process. I chair the subcommittees for the Departments of Health, for Public Safety, and for Administration, and I sit on the subcommittees for the Departments of Transportation, and Development of the capital budget, SB 230, has advanced past last Friday's deadline for submitting projects to the cochairmen of the House and Senate Finance Committees, Rep. Bill Stoltze and Sen. Bert Stedman. We now wait for the review process, prioritization, and the funding limits, which these co-chairmen will establish.

The movement of personal legislation is picking up a bit. We remain heavily engaged in development of a statewide energy policy, reviewing the ACES oil tax system, developing the Round 3 list of alternative energy projects, scrutinizing the governor's supplemental spending request, and developing the two major budgets mentioned above.

I introduced a bill last week, SB 299, to mandate that the state department of transportation develop standards and procedures for working with naturally occurring asbestos when confronted with the substance in road and other construction projects. There are apparently several localities in Northern and Western Alaska where naturally occurring asbestos is found at the surface, and needs special attention when construction projects are planned.

I have also introduced SJR 29 to request that U.S. Senators Begich and Murkowski seek amendments to the Magnuson-Stevens Act that would provide four new voting seats for members of federally recognized tribes and/or Alaska Native Organizations on the North Pacific Fisheries Management Council. We feel that the Lower Yukon area in particular, and other in-river fisheries in Senate District T are under-represented on this federal fisheries panel.

Olson Legislative Priorities

I want to report the status of my priority legislation:

SB 4 is on top; my bill to reinstate the Alaska Coastal Policy Council to oversee coastal zone management. This was scrapped during the Gov. Frank Murkowski years, and the controversy has not subsided. The bill is in the Senate Resources Committee, and I am currently working against a 2-FOR, 5-AGAINST committee opposition. The work continues.

SB 139 would provide monetary incentives for a variety of needed medical professionals with certain skills, by helping with their student loan repayments and other cash incentives. Vacancies in rural Alaska now, and projected into the future, could rise to alarming levels without a program like this for adequate health care delivery. SB 139 is in the Senate Finance Commit-

SB 144 would allow for resident subsistence harvesters to apply for and receive more than one permit for musk oxen hunts in Units 18, 22, and 23. Currently, every hunter is limited to one musk oxen permit per calendar year. No other species has this restriction. The health of the musk oxen herd is such that the one-permit-limit may be lifted. SB 144 is in the Senate Resources Committee.

SB 261: In addition to the above priorities, I am working on a bill in concert with the Regional Wellness Forum to identify a public member of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Board as a rural resident. We feel that the Board does not have sufficient attentiveness to the character of alcohol-related problems in rural Alaska villages as the seats are currently defined. This bill has passed the State Affairs Committee, and will next be heard in the Labor & Commerce Committee.

SJR 21 is my resolution to increase the number of House and Senate members here in the state legislature. I propose to add eight new House seats, and four new Senate seats for the purpose of ensuring fair and equal representation for certain rural areas as we contemplate the development of a new reapportionment plan next year. Some areas of the state will likely show population reductions in the next census, notably areas of the Interior and Southeast Alaska. SJR 21 is in the Senate Finance

Four!

Lance Mackey crosses the line and goes into the record books as the Iditarod's only musher to win four in a row

By Tyler Rhodes

Just in case the crowd had any doubt as to what he was after, when Lance Mackey left Willow for the start of the 2010 Iditarod he raised four fingers in the air.

Eight days, 23 hours and 59 minutes later, it was a bottle of champagne that Mackey lifted to the sky as he drove his 11 remaining dogs to Nome's Burled Arch for an unprecedented fourth Iditarod victory in a row.

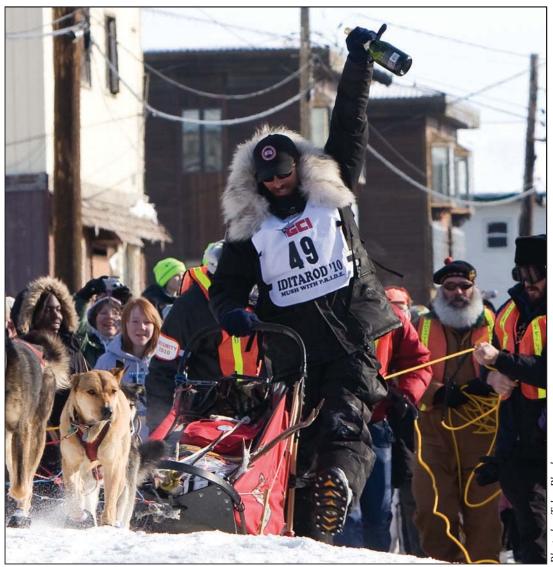

Drenched in sunshine and greeted by temperatures that finally climbed out of the subzero range and into the teens March 23, Mackey made history just shy of 3 p.m. as the only musher to put a string of four victories together. He had plenty of company to help celebrate the moment. The crowd collapsed on Mackey as he made his way toward the chute of Front Street, shaking his hand, offering congratulations and likely handing him that bottle of bubbly.

Mackey led the race the entire way up the coast after making a bold move coming off the Yukon River. He blew through the Kaltag checkpoint to grab the lead from another four-time winner, Jeff King, and continue on toward Unalakleet. He was able to hold that lead and claim the $2,500 in gold nuggets waiting for him in Unalakleet for being the first musher to the coast. "I wanted to spoil Jeff's fun a little bit and take one of those prizes," he said at the finish.

The gamble paid off as Mackey's dogs proved to be up to the challenge of a longer run on less rest, a common theme in Mackey's wins. "I

Morgan claims Nome-Golovin win

By Tyler Rhodes

After a disappointing and early scratch in this year's Iron Dog, Nome-grown Mike Morgan came home to seek a little redemption on a familiar course.

On a cold, cloudless Saturday, Morgan heated up the 200-mile course to take the 2010 Nome-Golovin Snowmachine Race in two hours, 21 minutes and 32 seconds. Morgan outpaced second place Chris Collins from Kotzebue by just over a minute. "It was a good run," Morgan said as he milled about the finish while fellow racers blazed through the chute every couple of minutes. As part of his prize, Morgan receives a free entry into next year's Iron Dog.

Morgan, racing a Polaris 600 Rush, said his machine gave him no problems as he negotiated the course that runs from the sea ice in front of Nome to Golovin and back. Others weren't so lucky. "There were a lot

Dear Editor,

I was surprised at the March 11 Nome School Board meeting that the board put the assistant principal position on the agenda for the "special meeting" scheduled prior to a regular work session (on March 23). This occurred almost immediately after the Board came out of an executive session. For anyone not familiar with what a "special meeting" is, it is a meeting the board holds to vote on action items outside of their regular meeting schedule. According to the FY11 Budget Development and Adoption Schedule handed out at their last meeting, the March 23 work session will include a discussion of the FY11 budget (that would be the school budget for next year). This budget includes an Assistant Principal position. I question if the Board intends to vote on whether the position will remain in the budget. I am concerned because at no point in the last several meetings has there been a PUBLIC Board discussion regarding the elimination of this position. How do I know? I have been essential for democracy.

Board Member Albert McComas and I had a discussion after the March 11 meeting and he claimed to have mentioned in past years that he saw no need for the Assistant Principal position at the Nome Beltz Junior and Senior High School. I do remember him mentioning his feelings in the past, but he never made a motion to eliminate the job. I know he has told several individuals since the January 12 School Board meeting that he voted no on Doug Boyer's contract because the Board and/or he wanted to cut that position. He actually spoke to Doug Boyer and told him the same thing.

I told Albert that I find it extremely suspicious that the board would schedule a vote to possibly eliminate a position that has not even been discussed publicly. That the board would do this just before they even discuss the FY11 budget in public is perplexing. During the February 23 work session, no board member spoke about eliminating the assistant principal position. During the March 11 meeting throughout "Board Members Open Discussion" no member of the School Board brought up the idea of eliminating the Assistant Principal position. During the business manager's lengthy explanation of the FY11 budget, no board member brought the idea of cutting that position. I do remember Board Member Barb Nickels asking the business manager if all the current positions are in the FY11 budget she presented. The answer was yes.

As I walked home from the March 11 meeting, I thought about the executive session that the Board held that night. The reason given to the public was very clear and exact: To consult with the District lawyer about a threatened lawsuit against the District. After coming out of the executive session, Kirsten Timbers asked that the "AP" assistant principal position be put on the "special meeting" agenda. I suddenly had a thought.... Eliminating the assistant principal position must have something to do with the executive session. Bingo! The Board, or at least some members, are worried about the lawsuit that they discussed in executive session. Mr. McComas and perhaps others have told people they voted no on the Assistant Principal contract because they wanted to eliminate the position. Yet the District has that position in their FY11 budget and NPS has advertised for the Assistant Principal position for over a month. There has been no public discussion at any board meeting about eliminating the position. I urge the Board to take this topic off the "special agenda" portion of the March 23 meeting. Discuss the elimination of the assistant principal position in public, during the work session scheduled for March 23. Allow public comment and discussion over a few weeks on this possibility. Give the public good, educationally sound reasons to eliminate the assistant principal position at the high school. Eliminating this position because they may be afraid of a lawsuit is an example of Board members showing no concern for what is best for NPS students. It certainly will not follow the NPS mission statement to "provide a positive learning environment that educates all students for success in life."

Operating Budget Moves to Senate

With four weeks remaining in the legislative session the House has passed its version of the Operating Budget and the bill moves to the Senate where they will re-write those portions of the budget that are not in line with Senate priorities. In the meantime the House is waiting for the Senate to pass their version the Capital Budget so that it can be considered by the House Finance Committee. Legislation of Interest

The Senate Resources Committee passed Senate Bill 220, the Alaska Sustainable Energy Act which outlines what will hopefully become the State's unified plan for dealing with energy issues. It is the intent of the bill to help Alaskan families, businesses, schools, and communities to cut their energy costs and find more economical ways of meeting their energy needs.

This is only one of the many bills that address energy issues, but appears to be the most comprehensive and has advanced to the Senate Finance Committee. The bill includes a broad range of policy tools intended to guide and aid in the effort to reduce energy costs while developing sustainable energy sources. The Near Term solutions are identified as creating a revolving loan program to help with energy efficiency upgrades to public buildings, community buildings, and schools. It also supports the Weatherization and Home Energy Rebate programs.

It would link the State's Heating Assistance Program, which supplements the federal Low-income Heating Assistance Program (LIHEAP), to the price of oil to increase assistance to low-income families when fuel prices are high. It would direct the Alaska Energy Authority to work with interested communities to establish a fuel coop to facilitate bulk purchases, lowering costs for small com-

Its mid-term goals would be to provide refundable tax credit to investors to encourage private sector investment in renewable energy sources and to expand the existing home owner loan program to small businesses. The long term goal would be to create a grant program to encourage development of emerging energy technologies.

All Alaskans Count / Census 2010

Just a reminder, during the Census, it is extremely important that everyone be counted. The census will become the basis for future representation and fund distribution. Reapportionment is based on the population numbers that are developed and annually over $400 billion in federal funds are distributed to tribal, state and local governments on the basis of population.

Legislature pushes for continued funding for Denali Commission

A joint resolution urging the Obama administration to reauthorize the Denali Commission for an additional five years and encouraging the U.S. Congress to fund it has passed through the state legislature. Bethel Rep. Bob Herron, D-Dillingham, sponsored the resolution. He said the importance of the Denali Commission in regards to rural infrastructure cannot be overstated and that the commission had invested $1 billion to improve the infrastructure and sustainability of rural Alaska. The resolution is on its way to Alaska Governor Sean Parnell's desk to be signed.

A bill introduced by Gov. Sean Parnell made its way out of the House education committee to the Finance committee. Parnell pushed the idea of a performance scholarship program for post-secondary education and to tie student's grades to state-sponsored scholarships at the University of Alaska.

State may get energy policy

In its third reading on the House floor and placed on the calendar for final passage is House Bill 306, an act for a state energy policy. The House Special Committee on Energy co-chairs Rep. Bryce Edgmon, D-Dillingham and Rep. Charisse Millett, R-Anchorage used a unique method to draft the bill — they didn't write it. Instead, they assembled 16 Alaskans familiar with energy policy issues to write what they believed would make a good energy policy for Alaska. Millet and Edgmon said an energy policy in statute would serve as a blueprint for future generations of Alaskans. The authors of the energy bill include representatives from the Alaska Center for Energy and Power, Native Corporations, ISER, the Resource Development Council, the Anchorage Economic Development Council, the Denali Commission, Alaska Conservation Alliance, AML, Alaska Power Authority, Alaska Village Electric Cooperative, energy consultants and the Renewable Energy Alaska Project. The bill is formulated to promote energy efficiency and conservation, the development of both renewable and non-renewable energy resource development and to coordinate governmental functions.

Delegation, state join to fight federal pollution laws, Endangered Species listings

Congressman Don Young, Senator Lisa Murkowski, and Senator Mark Begich met last week with Dr. Jane Lubchenco, Administrator for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration and Eric Schwaab, the Assistant Administrator for the National Marine Fisheries Service. They discussed the proposed Critical Habitat for the Cook Inlet beluga whale, the upcoming biological opinion on the Steller sea lion, the petitions to list the ice seals, and marine spatial planning. All three Alaskan legislators warned about the impact that various NOAA decisions could have on Alaska's economy. Rep. Young said he believes the Endangered Species Act is being misused and the result is a great disservice to Alaska, its people, and its economy. Young questioned the scientific integrity of NOAA and maintained that many decisions made by the agency under the ESA are done with little or no scientific information. Murkowski said that she shares the fear of many Alaskans that the growing number of endangered species listings and petitions could hurt the Alaskan economy. Freshman Senator Begich said he stressed the importance of using proper science and weighing economic factors when considering ESA regulations and ocean zoning proposals.

On the state level, a joint resolution opposing stricter Clean Air Act regulations by the federal Environmental Protection Agency just moved out of the House Resources Committee. Under the Clean Air Act, the EPA is now tasked by law to issue rules regulating global warming pollution from all major sources. including cars and coal-fired power plants. The law specifically states that EPA has to regulate dangerous pollutants once they are found to endanger public health or welfare. The Supreme Court issued in April 2007 a so-called endangerment decision after years of scientific research and analysis. While President Barack Obama's plan is to shift toward the clean energy economy and clean energy jobs, Alaskan legislators are sending a message to Congress to disapprove the EPA's "imposition" of climate regulations. Sponsor Bill Stoltze said in the sponsor statement that it would harm Alaska's economy and the livelihoods of the state's citizens. On the federal level, Sen. Lisa Murkowski welcomed letter campaigns by 20 governors including Alaska Governor Sean Parnell. The letters are urging Congress to prevent the EPA from imposing regulations on stationary sources of greenhouse gas emissions that some fear would hurt the economy. Parnell said the proposed rule would make energy more expensive for Alaskans and, balking at federal authority, said that this type of federal control would threaten jobs and economic development opportunities.

Coastal Management Program is making a comeback

A bill regarding the Alaska Coastal Zone Management Program is going to be heard in the House Resources committee on March 19. After former Governor Frank Murkowski weakened coastal communities' ability for input in coastal management, this bill is an effort to mend the partnership between the State of Alaska and coastal communities. It is to restore inter-agency cooperation in approving coastal districts enforceable policies and will reinstate a meaningful seat at the table for coastal districts in the review of proposed state and federal resource development actions.

Governor nominates two for North Pacific Fishery Management Council

Governor Sean Parnell nominated Duncan Fields of Kodiak and James Hubbard of Seward for consideration by the U.S. Secretary of Commerce for seats on the North Pacific Fishery Management Council. The governor also forwarded Sam Cotten of Eagle River and Matt Moir of Kodiak as alternate nominees. Fields and Cotton are currently serving their first term on the council. Moir is a current member of the NPFMC advisory panel.

Sale of Pilgrim Hot Springs nearly finalized

By Diana Haecker

A new company named Unaatuq LLC has emerged as the successful bidder and new owner of Pilgrim Hot Springs.

The 320-acre property north of Nome went on the auction block March 5, as the Catholic Diocese of Fairbanks went through the final steps of its bankruptcy proceedings tied to a slew of clergy sex abuse cases. The sale brought $1.9 million to be paid into the victims' settlement fund. Closing of the sale is projected to happen before the end of the month.

The newly formed entity Unaatuq—meaning "warm water" in Inupiat—is owned by Bering Strait Native Corp., Sitnasuak Native Corp., Norton Sound Economic Development Corp., Kawerak and the Native village corporations of White Mountain, Teller and Mary's Igloo. The four largest owners by capital contribution are BSNC, Sitnasuak, NSEDC and Kawerak.

BSNC's chief executive officer Gail Schubert said that plans on what to do with Pilgrim have not firmed up. In an e-mail correspondence, she said that the member owners have not yet met to determine a course of action. While Schubert said that the geothermal potential is of interest, it would be too expensive to pursue development of power generation and transmission at this time. Schubert quoted a study that pegged the cost of infrastructure necessary for power transmission to the Nome Joint Utility System grid at $100 million—and this would not include the cost of the tie-in power line to Nome.

Schubert said, however, that there is potential for tourism. "In addition, we've broadly discussed using the property for social and cultural activities, including youth camps and agriculture development [...], and other like activities," Schubert wrote. She added that BSNC had an eye on acquiring Pilgrim for almost two decades and to develop Pilgrim Hot Springs because of its tourism potential.

When asked whether or not the property will remain open to use by regional residents, Schubert said that the member owners have not discussed this yet. She added that they recognized that the hot springs have long been utilized by residents of the Bering Strait region for spiritual, medicinal and cultural purposes. "It's likely that the owners will want to provide for continued usage in some manner," Schubert wrote.

According to Schubert, it was a very emotional moment in the Anchorage courtroom when bankruptcy judge Donald MacDonald picked Unaatuq LLC over the second bidder Chena Power Group. "The new owners are grateful that Pilgrim is now under their stewardship," Schubert said.

But the sale has met with opposition from Nomeites and longtime Pilgrim occupants Louie and Nancy Green. The Greens had filed a quiet title action case and had submitted a request to stay the sale of Pilgrim. During their March 5 hearing—the same day the bankruptcy court approved Unaatuq as the highest bidder—the Greens' request was successful in U.S. District Court, putting a temporary hold on the sale.

But the following Monday, District Court Judge Ralph Beistline lifted his own order and the sale Pilgrim Hot Springs has now gone forward. The Greens have filed an appeal and are now awaiting the scheduling order from the judge when to present their arguments.

School district eyes $11.1 million budget

Draft budget would have Nome Public Schools asking for slightly more from city for next year

By Tyler Rhodes

If the numbers hold up in the first draft of its proposed budget for next year, the school district will be asking the City of Nome for $1.8 million.

The numbers were revealed as the Nome Board of Education received its first peek at the district's proposed budget for the next school year at its March 10 meeting.

Overall, the proposed request to the city would mark an increase of more than $124,000 over what the city provided the district for its current year's budget. By state law, the city will be required to contribute more than $1 million next year, an increase of approximately $58,000 over what it was required to pony up last year.

In addition to what the state requires the city to contribute, the municipal government has traditionally given more than the bare minimum to Nome's schools. Last year the city gave an additional $725,000. According to the draft budget, the district plans to request nearly $792,000 above and beyond what the state requires the city to pitch in for schools, an increase of $67,000 from 2009-2010.

Just as there is a minimum amount a local government can contribute to a district, there is also a maximum. The total proposed request of $1.8 million is nearly $1.1 million short of the maximum local contribution the state allows.

The lion's share of the funding for the district each year comes from the state, which bases its allocation on the number of students in a district. If the projected student count of 657 for 2010-2011 pans out, the state would contribute nearly $7.7 million. The state bases its level of funding on the number of students in a district. "Each time we lose or gain a student, it's about $9,000," the district's business manager Jenny Martens told board members at the meeting.

The projected count for 2010-2011 is for the same number of students that were predicted for the current school year. That prediction hit the nail on the head with the state funding the district for a population of 657 students. If the October student count falls short of what was predicted, the district is forced to scramble and lean out the budget to account for the reduced funding from the state.

Nome Public Schools knows that reality all to well after a dramatic and unexpected student decline at the time of the count in 2008-2009 required drastic cuts to the budget after the school year was well under way.

In addition to the predicted student count, the proposed budget hinges on a few other unknowns. The preliminary numbers assume that teachers' salaries will increase 1.2 percent, the final offer the district made before negotiations went into arbitration earlier this year. The teachers have asked for a 7 percent increase over two years.

The financial gulf between what each side is seeking is pretty wide. Depending on how the 7 percent would be spread out over the two years, the district calculates it would cost anywhere between $292,000 to $558,000 to satisfy the education association's two-year request. The district figured it would cost approximately $160,000 to implement its last, best offer.

The budget also assumes that utility and fuel costs, as well as electrical rates, will remain unchanged for next year. The proposed budget works under the assumption of a 15 percent increase to its health insurance premium and 10 percent increase to property/liability insurance and workers compensation insurance.

The preliminary budget also includes new staff. Penciled in are a new half-time special education teacher, a curriculum coordinator and a half-time principal position at the Anvil City Science Academy charter school. The charter school position would be funded by the state.

The board plans to discuss the proposed budget in more detail at its March 23 work session. A public hearing on the matter has been slated for an April 6 meeting. More board discussion is slated for the regular April 13 meeting. Adoption of the budget is scheduled for a special meeting April 27 following the board's work session. The district plans to present the budget to the city April 29 for the Nome Common Council's consideration of the funding request.

Assistant principal on the agenda

As the school board considers the proposed budget, they will also be examining the assistant principal position at Nome-Beltz Junior/Senior High.

In the final moments of the March 10 meeting, board member Kirsten Timbers asked that the assistant principal position be added to the agenda for a short special meeting to be held just before its work session March 23. Giving no more detail than that, it was unclear whether certain aspects about the position or its possible retention or elimination were to be discussed.

Board president Gloria Karmun said she did not know the intent of the majority of the board in regard to the position and referred questions about the motion to Timbers. When asked if the intent was to discuss the potential elimination of the position, Timbers would not elaborate. "The item is for discussion purposes and any determination will be made at the meeting," she said in an e-mailed response.

As of press time, the March 23 special meeting was slated for 5:30 p.m. at the Nome Elementary School Library. In addition to discussing the assistant principal at the meeting, the board plans to give superintendent Jon Wehde authorization to offer contracts to potential new-hire teachers he interviews at an upcoming job fair in Anchorage.

The assistant principal position, as well as the lead principal position, have been a controversial subject in Nome after the board cast a split vote Jan. 12 to not renew the contracts of current principal Janeen Sullivan and assistant principal Doug Boyer. The vote fueled outcry and emotional testimony - both for and against the decision-at the two ensuing, packed board meetings. The board has never made vocal their reasons for the move to remove the two administrators who had received favorable reviews and a recommendation to be retained from the superintendent.

It appears the issue will likely spill into the ballot box. Two efforts appear to have gathered enough signatures to put all five members up for a recall vote in the late spring.

A committee has been interviewing candidates for the principal's position. No offers for either job at the junior/senior high school had been made as of press time.

At the March 10 meeting, board member Barb Nickels attempted to introduce the hiring process for the positions onto the agenda. Nickels, who has been a staunch defender of Sullivan and Boyer, failed to get a second for her motion to discuss the process.

Nickels questioned Superintendent Wehde on why the two administrators were not being interviewed for their old jobs even though they had reapplied. Wehde replied that even though the two meet all the qualifications for the position, the fact that the board had decided to not retain them forced his hand in considering them ineligible for interviews.

"Would you still consider the two if the makeup of the board was different?" Nickels questioned. Wehde said he would not since, notwithstanding a contrary board decision, the board's action would stand even if its membership were to change.

Other action

The board spent a prolonged portion of the meeting in an executive session with legal counsel. Karmun said the closed-door session was held to discuss "a lawsuit threatened against the district." The board returned to open session after more than an hour of meeting in private. Nickels quickly excused herself from the meeting after the session, saying she felt ill.

In other action items at the meeting, the board gave approval to Wehde to conduct research in relation to his graduate studies at the University of Alaska Anchorage. Wehde said the project will examine how migrant education students prefer to learn. "If we can understand better how our students learn from their own reporting, can we adjust our curriculum to serve them better?" Wehde rhetorically asked in presenting the project.

Wehde announced the district will be purchasing eight more of the interactive "smart" white boards for classrooms. Wehde said the district has received a deal with manufacturer Promethean to buy the eight new boards at a discount of $14,000. The district currently has several of the boards in classrooms and has 18 teachers who have taken a class in using the technology. The district will use stimulus funds from the federal government to make the $27,000 purchase. Not including this purchase, the district has at least $110,000 remaining to be allocated from the stimulus funds awarded last year.

Five Alaskan biathletes shoot their way to the podium in Canada

By WISA reporters

This past week the northern Canadian town of Grande Prairie, Alberta, was not to be outdone by its neighbor to the east-Vancouver, the recent Olympic site—as it hosted its own international, multi-sport competition, the Arctic Winter Games.

Five Alaskan athletes—four from Western Alaska and one from the Interior—competed as part of Team Alaska at the eight-day, Olympicstyle event in biathlon. The sport combines either skiing or snowshoeing with target shooting.

Emerson Conger and Miranda Murphy, a junior and freshman at Nome-Beltz High school, respectively; Sierra Corsetti, a junior from Unalakleet; Asa Bergamaschi, a freshman from White Mountain; and Cy Conrad, a junior from Tanana, found themselves donning the Team Alaska uniform and walking among 2,000 athletes in the opening ceremonies of the games.

The five athletes qualified for the games by virtue of their performances at the 2009 state rural ski and biathlon championships, which are hosted by the Western Interior Ski/Biathlon Association (WISA). Conger and Corsetti were the biathlon winners in their respective high school divisions last spring, while Murphy and Bergamaschi were the winners in their junior high divisions. Conrad had taken second place in the high school boys division.

WISA athletes had one their best, if not the best ever, overall results at the Arctic Winter Games, with no athlete placing lower that fourth in any individual event. The WISA medal charge was led by the younger members, who competed in the snowshoe biathlon event, each in the juvenile category for athletes ages 10-15. Bergamaschi left the games with one gold and two silver medals in his three individual events. Murphy came away with three silver medals in her individual events. The two were members of the gold medal snowshoe biathlon relay team in the juvenile category.

Conger and Corsetti were the WISA representatives in ski biathlon and competed in the junior category for 16- and 17-year-olds. Conger took the bronze medal-missing silver by three seconds-in his second individual race, with only seven in the field of nearly 60 athletes outshooting him that day.

Both junior Alaskan ski biathletes were impressed by the Russian contingent, which sent only four members, all competing in ski biathlon. The Russian biathletes, who hailed from the northern province of Yamal, earned nine gold and two silver medals (with one disqualification) in their 12 individual races. Conger and Corsetti, as members of Team Alaska's junior ski biathlon relay team, came close to toppling the Russians, earning silver medals.

Conrad was the lone WISA snowshoe biathlete in the junior category. He earned a bronze medal in his third individual race.

Compared to their Anchorage teammates, who have access to a world-class, lit-at-night, biathlon venue, rural WISA athletes face great challenges in practicing their shooting. The group shot extremely well despite the disadvantages.

The most outstanding shooter of the team was Murphy, who had the highest shooting percentage of any of the field-junior or juvenile, ski or snowshoe - on the first day of the competition.

Both biathlon events are structured similarly, the only difference being the mode of transport. Athletes ski or snowshoe several times around a course, each time entering a shooting range where they gather their biathlon-specific 22-caliber rifles.

At each shooting session the athlete takes five shots from a distance of 50 meters. Juvenile competitors shoot all of their 10 or 15 rounds in the prone position, at a target 1.5 inches in diameter. In the junior category, athletes shoot half of their 10 or 20 shots in standing position, at targets 4.5 inches in diameter. Hitting a biathlon target after skiing or snowshoeing with an elevated heart rate has been likened to trying to thread a needle while riding a snowmachine.

Occurring every other year, the Arctic Winter Games is a high profile, circumpolar sports competition for northern and arctic athletes. The games celebrate sport, and promote social and cultural exchange

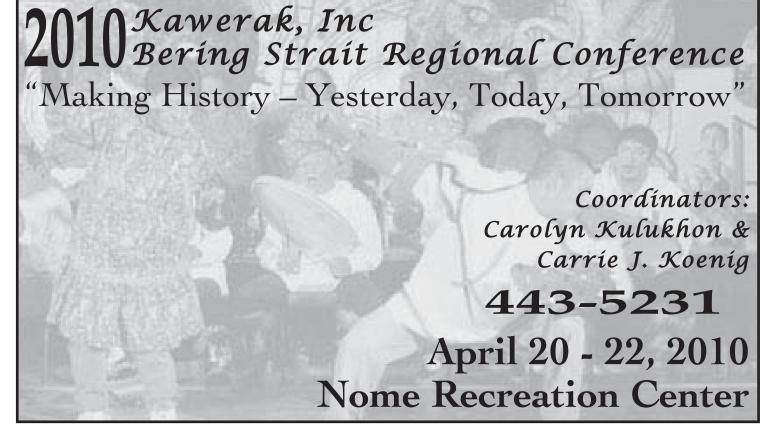

Although it started in 1970 with just a handful of sports, and only three contingencies (Yukon, Northwest Territories and Alaska), nine northern "nations" now compete in 21 different sports. Participation is limited to regions located north of the 55th parallel. Currently joining the three original members are Greenland, Russia, Northern Alberta, Nunavut, Northern Quebec and the Sámi Nation (northern Scandinavia).

While the juveniles did not have the chance to race head-to-head against the juniors in Alberta, both Bergamaschi and Murphy will be looking to unseat the incumbent high school rural biathlon champions at this year's Western Interior Rural Ski/Biathlon Championships to be held April 1-4 in Tanana.

of wrecks," Morgan said.

Three of those wrecks required a Blackhawk helicopter ride for the injured riders. The Alaska State Troopers and personnel from Nome's Alaska Army National Guard crew used the race day to conduct training exercises in relation to search and rescue missions. The training quickly turned into real-life application. Nome's Colton West was the first to get a ride after injuring his knee in an accident near White Mountain. Louis Warnke-Green was later picked up after complaining of back pain. Ross Outwater received the third ride after hitting an object near Topkok and crashing. Volunteer search and rescue personnel brought Outwater down to the Topkok mushers' cabin until the Blackhawk arrived and flew him to Nome for treatment.

In the women's race, Samantha Harris-Richards said she crashed four times—but it didn't stop her from winning. "Now I can buy my wedding dress," she said after the win. Noting that she has a summer wedding date and a $2,000 dress, Harris-Richards was happy to grab the win and cash prize. "I came with high expectations," she said.

Harris-Richards was racing an Arctic Cat, finishing in 38 minutes, 50 seconds. The women's race runs from Nome to Safety and back. Dora Hughes from Teller took second with a time of 39:12 on her Polaris IQ 600.

Collins was the first racer to cross the line overall in the 200-mile race, taking the A Class for machines larger than 600cc. Collins, riding a Ski Doo XPTNT, easily took the class title with a time of 2:22:33, more than five minutes of second-place Geoff Hubert.

Most of the top 10 overall times were posted from the riders in the in the 0-600cc Class. Morgan led the way for the smaller machines, followed by Steven Williamson from Kotzebue riding an Arctic Cat F6 with a time of 2:23:32.

The race also featured a class reserved for fan-cooled machines. Jerry Patton of Nome led the way in that race, finishing in 2:48:59 on his Polaris IQ Shift. Patton was followed in by Kotzebue's Frank Lane on his Arctic Cat 440 in 2:49:19.

Nanooks battle it out at state

As of press time Tuesday night, Nome's boys were slated to play in Wednesday night's state championship Class 3A basketball game at Anchorage's Sullivan Arena against Haines.

Nome worked its way to the final game with two hard-fought, low-scoring wins against Cordova and Mt. Edgecumbe. They were to face Haines Wednesday evening.

The boys edged Cordova on Monday with a 57-52 win in a game that was only separated by one point a couple of times in the final minutes. Nome ended the first quarter with a four-point deficit, but came back to outscore the Wolverines 10-2 in the second. Nome was led by state Class 3A player of the year Jeremy Head's 18 points, followed by Christian Leckband who scored 16. Tim Sullivan added 14. Mason Evans put up 5 points and Mikey Wongittilin scored 4.

The Nanooks had a little more cushion in Tuesday's game against Mt. Edgecumbe with a 57-42 win. The boys spread the wealth with Leckband scoring 15, Evans and Sullivan each putting up 14, Head with a baker's dozen and Wongittilin with 3.

Nome could have potentially faced Barrow in the championship game, making for a storybook end for a season that had the two teams battling back and forth throughout. Barrow, however, fell to Haines Tuesday evening.

The Lady Nanooks faltered right out of the gate in the state tournament to send them into the consolation bracket. To be fair, they faced a steep challenge in that first game against two-time defending state champions ACS. The Lions beat Nome 44-34.

Nome was led in the loss by Devynn Johnson's 20 points. Liz Sherman-Luce and Richelle Horner each added 5, while Renee Lammer and Hilary Stiles both scored 2. Nome was able to go on a run in the third quarter to even up the game 30-30, but a 14-4 fourth quarter in the Lions' favor sealed the deal.

The loss sent Nome to play Monroe Catholic on Tuesday. The Lady Nanooks won that match 23-21. Iris Warnke-Green scored 8 and grabbed 11 rebounds.

Nome was slated to play Glennallen on Wednesday morning to decide the tournament's fourth-place winner.

think we've done the right thing by the team," Mackey said as he sat under the Burled Arch in Nome, soaking up the win.

Mackey acknowledged that sometimes gambles pay off and sometimes they backfire, but said he didn't have any doubts as he made his move in Kaltag. "I try not to doubt my decisions because the dogs pick up on it," he said. "I try to make decisions that don't affect their performance."

Judging by the results, it appears Mackey's decisions registered just fine with the team. Mackey wasn't alone in recognizing his team's performance. A pretty tight pack of talented mushers running excellent teams of their own simply couldn't keep up. "The most talented dog racers in the world are breathing down my neck right now," Mackey said.

Among those was this year's Yukon Quest champion Hans Gatt, who tried to surge near the end of the race to close the gap. It simply wasn't enough. Gatt was faster on his run from Koyuk to Elim and then Elim to White Mountain; but it didn't matter. Gatt crossed the finish line a little more than an hour after Mackey to claim the runner-up honors. "My plan was to win it," Gatt said after stepping off the runners in Nome. "I did rest a little more [than Mackey], I guess that's why I'm second....When I went through Kaltag, I knew Lance was going to do it [keep going]. But I wasn't going to do it."

Mackey said he ran a slow-andsteady pace, starting conservative and pushing it later in the race. "The fastest time rarely wins, but the best team always wins," he said. "I don't focus my training and breeding program around speed." Mackey said his team ate well this year, something he stresses while training.

With a team that appeared healthy but ready for a bit of rest, Mackey said he was a bit embarrassed by how tired he let his team get as he drove them to the finish. Perhaps it's all a matter of perspective. While his dogs appeared robust this year, they were not barking in their harnesses, ready to keep pulling like last year's winners.

For a man who had been skimping on sleep and rest for more than a week, Mackey, himself, showed little sign of fatigue as he spoke with reporters, race officials and fans while working his way through the script of the finish line routine in what has become a yearly tradition. He accepted his larger-than-life check for $50,000 and his new Dodge pickup truck. He joked with the crowd, posed for photos and said he was looking forward to a drink and some king crab.

Pushed to answer on whether he would race next year or not, Mackey said it would be hard to say no. He also mused on letting his son, Cain, mush his team next year. "I have a boy who just turned 18 who really wants a [finisher's] belt buckle," he said. "It would make me equally as proud to see him finish a race as to win a fifth." While Mackey has already situated himself well in the record books, a fifth win would put him in even more rarified air, Rick Swenson is the only musher to have five victories under his belt.

One of the race's other four-time winners also showed Tuesday he can still compete with the best of them, even though he said he is no longer going to race the Iditarod. Another hour and some change after Gatt arrived, King roared into the finish line looking like his team was just going to keep on going and blast out the other side. With his arms raised in the air as he entered the chute and a smile on his face as he snacked his dogs and spoke with the crowd, King and his dogs looked like they were ready for another 50 miles of trail. "The run from White Mountain was absolutely spectacular. Good trail, great weather, great dogs," he said as the late afternoon sun cast a warm glow on his face.

Or perhaps it was a weight lifted off his shoulders that put the four-time champ and Iditarod icon in such a buoyant mood. "I won't be riding a dog sled back [to Nome]," King said as he affirmed that this would be his last Iditarod. If his promise holds true—even with a win being elusive for the past couple of races—it looked like King was going out on top. He beamed as he tended to his dogs, letting them lick his face. At one point he even sprawled out on his back in the middle of his team in a playful gesture.

Like Mackey and Gatt, King acknowledged the depth and caliber of the dog teams at the front of this year's race, including his own. "They're a really cool bunch of dogs," he said.

Noting that this was his fastest race ever, King said he could not cut his rest as short as Mackey to keep up the pace. Mackey's finish was also his fastest, yet it was about an hour and 15 minutes shy of the record set by Martin Buser in 2002.

Despite rocketing down Front Street to the finish, King said the display his team put on while on a firm trail was not indicative of what they were able to do the entire race. "They were unable to do that when the trail was crummy," King said, noting he encountered enough crummy trail for it to make an impact.

Another musher feeling that impact was former champ and race veteran Mitch Seavey. As he prepared to bootie his dogs in Koyuk on Monday, he said the race had taken its toll on his dogs' feet, spurring a condition he said mushers call "chicken foot." He said ice buildup on the back of the wrists on their front legs caused the hair to be pulled out, making their feet susceptible to frostbite. The problem forced him to more or less double-bootie nearly all of his team to give them extra protection. The work ate up precious time on the trail. "The race is second, my dogs are first," he said.

Despite the extra care his dogs required, he said they were healthy. "They're doing awesome," he said.

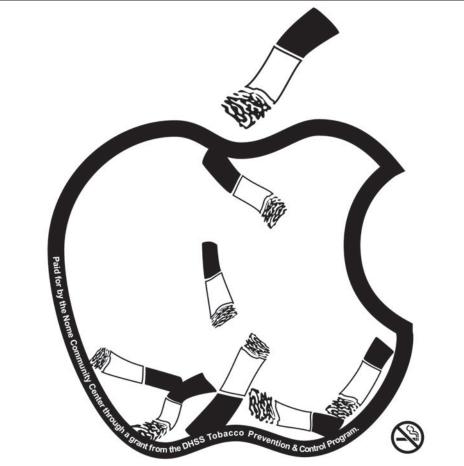

Even so, the clip set by the frontrunners was more than his team could match. "My pace has been what I thought I needed to do," he said. Midway in the race Seavey was running near the front. He said his team was mostly in good health, but was getting fatigued. "We're gonna plug in some more rest in the picture until the end of the race," he said.

Charters available!

As of press time Tuesday evening, Seavey was in 10th place, heading for Nome on the heels of his son, Dallas Seavey. Admitting he was a bit tired of a focus being placed on a fatherand-son battle among the ranks, the elder Seavey nonetheless said he was proud of his son, who he described as a close friend. "I taught him everything I've known," he joked. "I get two chances to do good. As a musher, how could I be happier."

The Nome Native Arts Center is featuring work by several local artists in its new shop in the Bering Straits Native Corp. building at 110 Front Street. The shop is located on the southwest corner of the building adjacent to the parking lot.

The artists are Terri Noongwook, Parson Noongwook, Eleanor Gologergan, Jason Iya, Elaine Kingeekuk, Hogarth Kingeekuk, Josh Menadelook, Regina Wongittilin and Ina Seppilu.

The NNAC was established as a nonprofit entity in 2006 by local Native artists to create opportunities for artists to bring their work to a wider audience. The organization aims to provide support and assistance to artists of the Bering Strait region, advise tribal governments on the protection of cultural identity from exploitation, and promote and sustain dynamic arts and cultural values. The center is striving to create a support system to develop artists and artwork for effective trade in the global economy.

Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. recently granted $10,000 to the NNAC for an Iditarod trade initiative. Tim Towarak, president, and Gail Schubert, chief executive officer, of Bering Straits Native Corp. donated space in the corporation's building to the NNAC for one year.

Marilyn Koezuna-Irelan serves as president of the NNAC. Board members are Sylvester Ayek, Tim Towarak, Alice Rogoff, Sue Greenly, Chris Alowa and Mary Jane Litchard. Iditarod staff members are George Olanna and Wilma Osborne.

The Bering Strait region is home to indigenous people recently who continue to engage in an economy rooted in subsistence cultures and to produce some of the world's greatest art. Subsistence remains an indelible and viable part of the economy for Bering Strait residents.

UAF Marine Advisory Program agent Heidi Herter bids farewell to Nome Legislative funding needed for MAP agents in Nome and five other communities

By Laurie McNicholas

Heidi Herter completed a threeyear commitment as Nome's first Alaska Sea Grant Marine Advisory Program (MAP) agent on March 5 and headed to Mexico for a wellearned vacation. Herter's position was completely funded—salary, benefits, travel and equipment costs—by Norton Sound Economic Development Corp., noted MAP's associate director/program leader Paula Cullenberg in an email to The Nome

"It was a grant from NSEDC to the University-we had a clear understanding that Heidi was a MAP agent in the MAP system and Heidi was supervised by me, as I do with all other MAP faculty," Cullenberg wrote. "The UAF Northwest Campus provided office space and utilities and MAP paid for support staff and direction from me.'

The Nome MAP office will reopen with a new agent only if the Alaska Legislature provides funding for the position. MAP offices in Cordova, Dillingham, Petersburg and Unalaska also are due to run out of grant funds this year. "We've struggled for years to keep these positions operating on various state, private and federal grants," Cullenberg said. The MAP agent position in Kodiak has been unfilled for the past 13 years.

Gov. Sean Parnell declined a request from the University of Alaska's

Board of Regents to include $614,000 in his 2010 budget to permanently fund MAP positions in the six communities, so University officials have asked the Legislature to fund them. Legislators have received scores of letters supporting the University's request.

In early March speakers from several communities asked the House Finance Committee to endorse funding for the six MAP offices durstatewide teleconfere n c e . "Twentysix people testified over two days from

s e v e n sites-two mayors, three school district people...two Alaska Native groups, three tourism industry folks, three economic development organizations, five Cooperative Extension or university folks, seven fishermen's associations [and] three science centers/museums," reported Cullengberg.

Even so, the House Finance Committee rejected Rep. Neal Foster's effort to amend the House budget to fund the MAP request by a 7-3 vote on March 8. MAP supporters then shifted their funding hopes to the Alaska Senate.

On March 9 Sen. Lyman Hoffman (D-Bethel), told Dillingham's KDLG radio listeners that funding the MAP positions is doable in the current legislative session. Hoffman's District S includes two communities with MAP offices in need of funding-Dillingham and Unalaska. He is co-chairman of the views. Heidi Herter, a bright young person with a recent master's degree, was chosen to fill the position. Ms. Herter has done well as the MAP agent, and the region has seen the benefit of this scientist apply her expertise to a variety of issues.

"MAP has worked with various groups of the fishing industry to improve opportunities and to facilitate > educathe tional needs of the fishers and processor,' Lean continued. "Classes vessel safety, cold water survival. sanitary processing economic decision-making were some of the courses offered. As others saw those offerings, the program offered training in diving and scientific sampling for interest groups that were not directly linked to fishing. The University teamed with NACTEC [the Northwest Alaska Career and Technical Education Center] to encourage students to pursue their education in the sciences and math program, by offering summer camps, directed classes and mentoring programs.

"The University has also teamed with Kawerak and local villages to address development impacts and their management," Lean noted. "It appears that a regional watershed council is in its formative process. The MAP agents have worked with NSEDC and NSSP [Norton Sound Seafood Products] to publish scientific findings, conduct outreach on local scientific research and arctic research as well as providing expert advice on developing new commercial fisheries. Most of this work was done by the local MAP agent, Herter. The visiting agents that had more depth in a few subjects were supported by the local agent while they visited or wrote their findings.

"The long list of work that has been accomplished in the last three years is a tribute to the industriousness of Herter," Lean added. "She is full of enthusiasm and ideas and has served as a spark plug for many of us in Nome. Heidi would commonly get an idea and pitch it to whom she could, often developing teams that would not have formed nearly as quickly. She more than pulls her load on any project, and for all these reasons it has been a pleasure to work with her. With her plans to further her education/ professional ca-

Nome sends medical relief to Haiti

By Bob Lawrence, MD

Last week my son Degnan and I had the privilege of representing our region on a medical relief effort to the country of Haiti. We carried with us the well wishes, money, and gifts sent by many people in the Norton Sound region. This article is meant to provide you with a small taste of the work we were able to accomplish with your support.

Haiti, the poorest country in our hemisphere, suffered a devastating blow in January when a 7.0 earth-quake hit the capital city of Port-au-Prince. Over 230,000 people are believed to have perished in the quake. 1.3 million more people were either injured or displaced from their homes.

As with any natural disaster, the initial response to the situation in Haiti was swift, involving multi-national organizations, governments, and volunteer personnel from all over the world. Now, however, these organizations and volunteers are slowly departing, and the hard work of rebuilding Haiti's fragile infrastructure is falling back into the hands of people who were already at work in Haiti before the earthquake occurred. Our group provided support to one such development organization called the Haiti Christian Development Project.

When landing in Port-au-Prince, we could see the city had been reduced to a patchwork of rubble and plots of land covered with blue and white tents. Those who survived the collapse of their concrete homes and business have been displaced to these tent cities, which have popped up around Port-au-Prince. Over a million more people have moved back to the mountainous countryside to live with family or friends.

Our relief team primarily worked in the city of Gonaives, Haiti, located about 100 miles north of Port-au-Prince. This coastal dusty city bordered by denuded mountains suffered its own devastation in 2008 when a series of hurricanes caused massive flooding which covered much of the city in mud. The city has now become one of the many havens throughout the country harboring refugees from the earthquake in Port-au-Prince.

HEALTH

Our trip was organized by Dr. David Smith, a cardiologist from Little Rock, Arkansas. He is the founder of the Haiti Christian Development Project, a program designed to teach Haitian people how to farm, raise animals, render medical care, and sustain businesses through micro-credit programs. The goal of the program is to provide tangible support to local citizens so that they are not forced to rely on outside income but can rely on themselves for development.

During the week we participated in five makeshift clinics set up in and around Gonaives. The clinics provided medical, dental, and eye care to more than 2,000 patients. The team consisted of 4 medical doctors, 3 dentists, an optometrist, a pharmacist, 3 medical students, a nurse practitioner, a team of nurses and nursing students, and several support staff members including a representative from Nome Public Schools, 12-year-old Degnan Lawrence.

Degnan had a unique experience working in a variety of clinic stations. He helped distribute glasses, assisted in eye exams, and helped distribute medications. He spent one day scrubbing dental instruments and assisting the volunteer dentists doing open-air procedures in a hot mountain village clinic. When asked if he would go again, Degnan quickly replied, "Yes, definitely. It was a fun experience, and I got to help make people's lives better."

After work, Degnan was usually found playing soccer with his new Haitian friends or teaching them to throw a Frisbee. He was amazed by their strength and energy. "I threw a Frisbee up in a palm tree on accident and some Haitian boy climbed the tree like it was on a playground and got the Frisbee."

This was Degnan's first trip to Haiti. He has seen pictures from many of my previous trips and watched scenes on the nightly news for several weeks, but still many things surprised him. "Haiti is crowded and loud like I expected," says Degnan, "but they were more developed than I thought. I thought they would all live in huts, but they live in strong looking houses and use cell phones."

Degnan and I got to experience a ride to the market in a Haitian tap-tap, a makeshift old Toyota-truck-turned-taxi in which 15-20 people cram into the back. Regarding the ride Degnan said, "I don't know what the driving laws are in Haiti, but they seem to drive randomly on the road and honk a lot. I guess as long as you don't hit anybody, it's legal."

Our medical relief clinics were adapted for a variety of settings. We worked in concrete buildings, mud huts, and tin roofed pavilions. One of our favorite sites was a clinic set up under a large mango tree grove. The trees' large canopy provided shade from the sun, and occasionally, a rush of wind during a consultation would cause the tree-ripened fruit to fall to the ground beside us, making a delicious snack for both providers and patients. One time, when a gust of wind came, a fresh mango fell into the dentists' sterilizing tub for cleaning tools, causing one of the dentists to joke, "Now we have a sterilized

Lean served on the selection committee that recommended hiring Herter for the Nome MAP position, as did Rose Fosdick, vice president of Kawerak's natural resources division. "I really liked the work Heidi and Claudia Ihl were doing with NACTEC students," Fosdick said. Students who successfully completed the field biology course conducted by Herter and Ihl, a musk ox specialist, earned one credit from the UAF Northwest Campus. Fosdick said she hopes the course encouraged some students to pursue scientific careers in natural resources.

"My husband is a fisherman and he and his crew took the training in survival gear and fighting fires," Fosdick said. The marine safety education program Herter developed included survival training courses for commercial fishermen and workshops in surviving cold water emergencies for high school students.

"Just having Heidi and Claudia work together to bring us the International Polar Year Speaker Series was really great," Fosdick added. In a two-year period, some 1,400 residents of the Bering Strait region heard 17 speakers in science, the arts and history discuss current issues such as the impacts of changes in sea Fosdick said Herter worked with Kawerak's social scientist, Julie Raymond-Yakoubian and fisheries researcher Dr. Kate Myers of the University of Washington on a project to collect current and historical information on Chinook salmon in the Bering Sea.

the hundreds before dawn to wait for hours in the hot sun for their turn to see a medical provider, dentist, or an eye doctor.

Like most endeavors in under-developed nations, medical care in Haiti requires a combination of critical thinking and creativity. On more than one occasion our team was forced to think through how to take care of very sick patients with life threatening infections having access to only a limited number of medications. We had no intravenous fluids but relied on oral rehydration fluids to resuscitate patients with dehydration

It is hard to describe, much less know how to address, the desperate needs in Haiti. The Haitians have a saying, "beyond mountains, there are mountains," meaning that beyond this tragedy there is another. The history of Haiti bears this out. Earthquakes, floods, dictatorships, and the more recent fragile democracies of Haiti have kept this country of 9.7 million in desperate poverty. Despite nearly a century of foreign aid, the majority of people still only make around one dollar per day.

But Haiti's case is not hopeless. There are amazing people in Haiti working to improve the lives of their citizens. One such person is Gueston Pacius, an Auburn University-trained Haitian gentleman who now serves as the director of development for HCDP in Haiti. According to Mr. Pacius, HCDP plans to provide the refugees with training, education, and micro-loans to support the rebuilding of Haiti by Haitians. Pacius likes to say, "Our vision is to help the people, to help the poor, not to have more, but to be more."

Pacius, whose daughter suffered a broken arm in the earthquake, gets up at four each morning to ensure the group at his small compound are fed and the students are ready for school at seven. Since the earthquake, Pacius and his family have slept in a walled tent, reserving their small 400-square-foot home for up to 60 refugees, who sleep in shifts and share what food they have. Fifteen of these refugees are students from Port-au-Prince whose school was destroyed by the earthquake.

Nome students from the organization called ACTION, a service group of the Anvil City Science Academy, along with other donors from the Norton Sound region raised over $1,000 to support fellow students in Haiti. This money was used to pay the tuition for students whose education was disrupted when their school was destroyed by the earthquake. Without these funds, students would not have been able to complete the school year. There is no public education as we know it in Haiti. Families must work hard to raise enough money to provide their children with an education. Pacius was grateful for the gift and said, "tell the people in Nome that your gift will allow many students to finish school this year."

Perhaps these very students will be the ones who, like Pacius, will use what they learn to make Haiti a bet-

In addition to the medical clinics, our group installed new water filtration systems, made improvements to the HCDP educational farm, distributed tents, and initiated a reforestation program in the Gonaives region. When asked what he would bring on a future trip, Degnan said, "I would bring them soccer balls, because that's what they play, soccer."

In the end, what we take is not the most important part of this type of trip. As one doctor put it, "People in Haiti don't care so much what you bring, they appreciate that you cared enough just to show up." For our part, we were proud to show up on behalf of the good people of the Norton Sound region. Our region has many gifts and it is an honor to share these gifts with friends who are struggling in far away places.

erak participated in Hokkaido University's International Polar Year research survey aboard the RV Oshoro Maru." Fosdick recalled. "Each spent about one week on different legs of the trip. In August Kawerak and the University of Washington collaborated with Hokkaido University faculty to organize and sponsor a one day public symposium on their research projects in Nome.

"I hope we get that [MAP position] back," Fosdick added.

Water quality monitoring

During a brief interview shortly before she left Nome, Herter said her marine safety education program and water quality monitoring work are among her most significant efforts as a MAP agent. She said it would take 50 percent of a MAP agent's time to help build a cohesive watershed alliance in the region by compiling and interpreting data and providing training in water quality sampling and related support.

"White Mountain has two years of excellent water quality data," Herter said. "The Environmental Protection Agency funded the village's water quality program and Eric Morris provided training. Eric's data set is the best I have seen-no data gaps." Herter said she was invited to Elim, where a trainer showed tribal council members how to do water quality monitoring in the Tubutuluk River.

"The Elim monitoring project is funded with a Bureau of Indian Affairs grant," she noted. "Most other tribes get grants from the EPA." She said several villages in the region conduct water quality monitoring projects.

Last month Herter helped organize a waste and water workshop in Nome that drew about three dozen participants. Most of them said the workshop had strengthened their support network for environmental projects and that they intend to take further action on water quality monitoring in their communities. Herter stressed the importance of forming partnerships in all of her programming efforts. "If I can't find a good partner, it probably wasn't a good idea," she said.

Born and raised in Anchorage, Herter earned a bachelor of science degree in biology from the University of Puget Sound and a master of science degree in fisheries from the UAF, Juneau Center. She has applied for a summer job with the U.S. Geological Survey to do shellfish research at Auke Bay near Juneau.

"This job has been a big commitment, and I need six months at least to reconnect with friends and family," she said. Eventually she plans to start a doctoral program in fisheries in Alaska or Oregon, she tion? I have not yet received a response from Board Chair Gloria Karmun, but neither Kirsten Timbers, who asked that it be added to the special agenda just following the most recent closed door meeting, nor Albert McComas can say, citing the confidentiality of discussion during executive session. What about open discussion and public comment? I am told the public should come to the meeting to hear the discussion and they will be informed. Anyone can attend the meeting and address the Board prior to the special session, at which point it is still unclear what may be discussed, or after the session (prior to the work session) when any voting will already be concluded and binding. Hmmm, seems like another "just trust us, we'll do the right thing" to me. I'm feeling very uninformed and you have not earned my trust so far this year!

Can this pending development possibly be good for our kids? Why the big rush? Why does this need to be an action item to be voted on in a special session that can't wait for the next regularly scheduled meeting? How does this relate to a "threatening lawsuit against the school district"? How does this work with the superintendent's recently unveiled plan to restructure the administration, adding and relocating several positions for greater efficiency? All of these positions, including the AP are in the current draft budget. The board did not question or discuss them during the budget presentation with the exception of Barb Nichels asking whether they were all included. How will a change to the AP position affect the school climate at Beltz this fall when my son enters 9th grade, especially if there is a new principal?

I don't like feeling distrustful of our elected officials but I have been regularly attending school board meetings for the past nine years and certain recent actions seem completely unprecedented and contrary to the procedures I have become familiar with. These include separating out specific administrative contracts for non-retention, executive sessions which seem to involve personnel who have not been called in to hear what is being said about them, and now an unexplained rush action item involving the Assistant Principal position. Do you have questions?

Man injured after being thrown from snowmachine

Shortly after 7:30 p.m. March 12, the Nome Police and Volunteer Ambulance departments were called to the scene of a traffic accident involving a snowmachine and a parked truck.

It was reported that Thomas F. Lee, 59, lost control of the snowmachine he was driving. The machine careened easterly out of control down W. First Ave., spinning around 180 degrees. While traveling backward with Lee on board, it struck a parked truck in the 200 block of W. First Ave. The machine continued to spin and traveled easterly until it ultimately threw Lee from the machine and onto the roadway before the machine stopped.

Lee was not wearing a helmet at the time of the accident and appeared to have suffered head injuries. He was transported to Norton Sound Hospital for treatment of his injuries.

Investigation in on going. Persons with information about this accident are urged to share their information with the Nome Police Department at 443-5262.

Council sets recall vote

Recall election for all five school board members slated for May 25

By Laurie McNicholas

The Nome Common Council has authorized City Clerk Sandy Sturgis-Babcock to conduct a special election limited to the question of recalling all the members of the Nome Board of Education on May 25.

The council unanimously adopted a resolution to schedule the special election during a meeting on Monday. The resolution notes that the city clerk has approved five applications for recall petitions directed at all five members of the school board and has certified the required number of signatures of qualified Nome voters obtained by the sponsors of each recall petition. The school board members are Gloria Karmun, Albert McComas, Barb Nickels, Heather Payenna and Kirstin Timbers. The recall petitions for Karmun, McComas, Payenna and Timbers were initiated by a different group than the group who initiated the recall petition for Nickels.

State law requires that a recall election be scheduled not less than 45 days or more than 75 days after the city clerk has certified a recall petition. In discussion prior to voting on the resolution, Councilman Stan Andersen asked Babcock whether the city is awaiting approval of the recall election from the U.S. Department of Justice.

Dear Editor,

My name is Eleanor Amaktoolik and I would like to clarify and comment on the article written about my brother Joseph Amaktoolik, who was shot by trooper Stroebele on March 3, 2010. Tyler Rhodes misinterpreted my statement about my brother's illness.

In the article, Tyler made it sound like my brother was crazy at the time. When I told Tyler my brother was losing grip on reality; I told him it was not all the time. I meant to say that my brother sometimes exhibited short period of delusions "hearing

My older sister, others from our community and I know that the article is factually inaccurate. We also do not believe that trooper Stroebele was justified in shooting and killing Joseph Amaktoolik, our brother. Eleanor Amaktoolik Golovin, AK

Dear Nancy,

I would like here to express my heartfelt condolences to the family of Joe Amaktoolik of Golovin. I thought the sense of mourning I had would subside naturally, as many friends and family have passed on over the course of years. One acquires a survivor's mentality. The shooting of Joe has been more difficult for me to spiritually metabolize.

I first noticed Joe as a child when I worked at the Golovin fish plant, and later commercial fished salmon there. He was a happy, nice kidusually smiling. My professional association with him began years later when a few of us were trying to prove Norton Sound fishermen could crab competitively against outside vessels. There were some tough years. For a few of them, one or two local boats clung to the fishery, in hopes of proving it viable, hoping that more money would be invested one day if we hung on, so others might have a chance to participate, so the money earned could stay in Norton Sound and help families.

Joe joined my crab boat as a sole crewmember, when I used a 22-foot salmon skiff to fish far offshore. These were dangerous trips. When we checked pots, water would often come to our gunnels. Sometimes we'd come back through winds so high, and sea spray so dense, that we had to point our heads to the wind and breathe through our noses because our mouths would otherwise fill with saltwater. Joe was always fearless, always kind ... never showing a temper. He was always there to risk his life again when I asked. He was always in his element on the edge, when nature dealt its toughest

He had a habit of buying a couple of cans of tropical fruit from his own pocket. And half way through the voyage, whatever open boat we were on over the years, when we were dead beaten, and bone cold, he'd pull out the two cans of fruit to share. And somehow the notion of eating food from a tropical climate, in the subarctic, warmed our entire being.

Once he absolutely saved my life.

We were far offshore trying to come home in a bad storm. I was only making 1.5 knots. When I tried to speed up to 2 or 2.5 knots, a blue wave covered our boat, and heeled it over on its side. Water came close to filling it up. I asked him to do a series of things that needed to be done to right the vessel, while I tried to control it. Had he lost his nerve, or his balance, we would have never re-

The last time I traveled with Joe we drove my present boat from Bristol Bay. Tommy and Myrtle Johnson were also coming back with theirs at the same time. But they needed help. Joe offered to drive them home to Nome. They pulled their boat alongside mine, and he joined them somewhere past Round Island, and stayed up driving north for more than two days straight, without sleep. Caring for them, pointing the boat safely home, showing his great respect for these fine old people. I'll always remember Myrtle saying how nice he was, and moving him into their apartment to live with them for a while on their safe return home. I doubt the locally owned crab fishery would be here without him. He was the only one who had the nerve to go out with me when it was critical someone be out there to keep the pressure on

If a family asks for help with a loved one, there needs to be a more humane way of delivering assistance to them. Recently, I listened to a House Finance Committee teleconference. I was waiting to hear on a different matter, but there were elderly folks from bush communities talking about the side effects of powerful drugs being prescribed to their young. The negative reactions put their children at risk, or made them suicidal; and there was no safe place to care for them in a remote community.

A civilization defines itself by how it treats its weakest members. We

Editorial

The last tail has trotted under the burled arch and Iditarod XXXVIII has drawn to a close. The red lantern has been extinguished and the hype and hullabaloo has been put to rest for another year. Nomeites can exhale a sigh of relief and get back to business as usual.

It seems that in recent years the fun events of the Month of Iditarod get compacted into two short weeks with less of a turnout. In years past Nomeites would turn out to pack Front Street solid all the way down past the Post Office. This year the crown thinned at the Sitnasuak Building. Interest waned after the first few mushers. In past years there were Nome Kennel Club events. Not so now. We didn't even have a Nome National Forest this year. There used to be dog weight pulls and other events that captivated the Nome audience. In recent years the events seem to be geared for out of town television crews and Iditarod Insiders. The Nome Nugget was even denied its historic presence in the chute. Soon after the first mushers arrived the television crews and visiting press were at the airport waiting for the plane

Senate Hearing Capital Budget

The Senate Finance Committee has been holding hearings on the governor's Capital Budget but there still is not a Senate Finance Committee Substitute showing the changes that the Senate Finance Committee would like to see. The House Finance Committee schedule lists the bill for Wednesday afternoon, but that is probably overly optimistic. The Capital Budget is important to Rural Alaska because it determines the amount of money that will be available for community projects such as roads, airports, housing, sewer and water, equipment and other community priorities. To date there has been little or no information, but within the week there should be some idea of what will be included in the Senate's version of the Capital Budget.

House Energy Policy Bill

The House unanimously passed its version of the State Energy Policy bill HB 306 this week. This bill is similar to the Senate Bill that passed last week. It addresses the economic impact that affordable and reliable energy will have on future development within the State.

The House bill does not provide any funding for energy projects. It is intended to serve as a "road map" for decisions on future energy spending as Alaska works on the development of emerging technologies. The Senate and House Energy bills reflect the common ground that was found during their six months of work with communities across the state. Both bills also recognize that conservation and energy efficiency play an important part in our energy future.

Emission Issues

The legislature and governor addressed two separate issues that could potentially impact diesel power generation throughout western Alaska. Even with other power generation sources, western Alaska will still be fied to diesel generation for its base load in the foreseeable future. House Joint Resolution HJR 45 urges the U.S. Congress not to enact two U.S. Senate bills that would cap carbon emissions. Cap and Trade will substantially impact our business development and increase daily costs such as power generation.

The State is challenging the Environmental Protection Agency's major expansion of its authority to regulate greenhouse gas emissions. It has also clearly signaled that its next step is to regulate emissions from 'stationary sources' such as community power plants. It could even come down to a level that schools and other community facilities would be regulated. Experience indicates that added regulation escalates rural costs and hampers economic growth, such as fish processing and resource development.

The End is Near

As we approach the end of the Twenty-sixth Legislature, the pressure to pass pending legislation has increased since all existing bills die when this legislature adjourns.

House Finance is currently focused on legislation that has been backing up as we dealt with the operating budget. The committee meets at 9:00 a.m. and 1:30 a.m. daily. The Senate is already holding daily floor sessions and the House will start daily floor sessions on Monday.

State energy bill moves through House

Last week, the Alaska House of Representatives unanimously passed the so-called state energy policy bill, hailed as the road map to Alaska's energy future. The bill was sponsored by the House Special Committee on Energy and aims to establish an overarching energy policy to guide the legislature, the administration, utilities, conservation groups as well as Alaskan residents toward the goal of affordable and stable energy in Alaska. The bill is a bit unusual in that it was drafted over the course of the last six months by 16 energy experts picked by the House special committee on energy. Committee co-chair Charisse Millett, R-Anchorage, said that the policy outlines priorities for renewable and nonrenewable energy, conservation and efficiency and balances the needs between urban and rural Alaska. Co-Chair Rep. Bryce Edgmon, D-Dillingham, added that the group formulating the policy worked to find common ground to build an energy policy that recognizes Alaska as a resource development state but that conservation and efficiency measures also play an important role in the state's energy future.

Railroad executive named new UA president

The University of Alaska Board of Regents has picked Patrick Gamble as new UA president. Gamble currently is president and chief executive officer of the Alaska Railroad Corp., a position he's held since 2001. He retired as a four-star general in 2001 after a long career with the U.S. Air Force. Gamble will replace current UA President Mark Hamilton, who announced his retirement last June. Hamilton has served as president of the 15-campus UA System since 1998. The transition will happen in June. Gamble said his number one priority as president will be to ensure a quality education for students. He also wants to gain more public support for the University of Alaska, continue the university's strong presence in research important to Alaskans and engage the university in broader state economic development opportunities. Governor Sean Parnell was pleased with the regents' choice and congratulated

Parnell pushes for cruise ship tax reduction

Governor Parnell last week traveled to Miami for a cruise ship convention, to propose a compromise as cruise lines are fighting the per-passenger head tax with a lawsuit against the state. Parnell's suggestion to cut the tax from $46 to $34.50 per passenger caused cruise executives to consider dropping their lawsuit and sending more cruise ships to Alaska. Alaska residents voted in 2006 to levy the tax on cruise ship passengers to pay for state projects.

After Alaska experienced steady growth in the cruise ship tourism, tourism businesses are worried about the projected 17 percent decline in cruise visitation this summer. That will translate to 140,000 fewer passengers coming to Alaska during the four-month cruise season. However, this is not projected to affect the Nome and Bering Strait region.

State joins Murkowski in fight against EPA's regulating greenhouse gases

Last week, the State of Alaska filed a motion in court to intervene in a lawsuit over a recent Environmental Protection Agency decision to regulate greenhouse gas emissions under the Clean Air Act. Challenging the EPA's decision in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, Governor Sean Parnell said he is worried that the EPA is extending its authority and fears negative impacts on the state's economy. Attorney General Dan Sullivan said that the state has fought the EPA to regulate greenhouse gas emissions since 2003. Sullivan said that it would impose a regulatory burden that would severely hamper economic growth and resource development throughout the state. The state is not challenging the science on climate change underlying EPA's decision, according to Sullivan. Rather, the state is challenging EPA's position that Congress intended the EPA and states to regulate greenhouse gas emissions through the permitting requirements of the Clean Air Act. U.S. Sen. Lisa Murkowski, who also trying to stop the EPA from regulating greenhouse gas emissions, has applauded the state's intervention. Sen. Murkowski recently introduced a bipartisan "resolution of disapproval" that would prevent the EPA from what she felt is the imposition of back-door climate regulations under the Clean Air

US Senate passes FAA bill

The US Senate this week passed 93-0 the Federal Aviation Administration Air Transportation Modernization and Safety Improvement Act. The bill includes $8.1 billion nationwide for Airport Improvement and $175 million a year for the Essential Air Service program, subsidizing regular air service to rural areas, including 45 communities in

An amendment introduced by Alaskan Senators Lisa Murkowski and Mark Begich gives Alaska an exemption to a new rule which went into effect last October requiring cylinders of compressed oxygen and other oxidizing gases to be shipped in rigid, thermal-resistant "super boxes" when transported on aircraft. The rule has proved to be overly burdensome in rural Alaska, but special permits for Alaska allow for transport without a "super box." To draw attention to the issue, Iditarod musher Pete Kaiser carried an oxygen cylinder in his sled bag. The FAA bill seeks to modernize the nation's air traffic control system from outdated ground-based radar to a more accurate satellite tracking system. Other items in the bill include a passenger's bill of rights, measures to combat pilot fatigue, enhanced training, allowing airlines to look at a pilot's complete history when hiring, and holding regional airlines and their partners more accountable for

Alaska politicians split on health care overhaul

By Diana Haecker

In the middle of the revelry surrounding the Iditarod at its awards banquet Sunday night in Nome's Recreation Center, emcee John Handeland took to the microphone to tell the room some non-dog-related news-the House of Representatives passed by a 219 to 212 vote the much-debated overhaul of the nation's health care system.

A mix of groans and applause filled the room, likely mimicking the reaction in the House Chambers in Washington, D.C.

The vote went along party lines with 219 Democrats voting yes, and all 178 Republicans and 34 Democrats casting votes against the bill. While the Obama administration declared victory, Alaska Republicans, including Sen. Lisa Murkowski, Congressman Don Young and Gov. Sean Parnell condemned the health care reform bill. Sen. Mark Begich praised its passage in a press release issued March 23.

Murkowski issued a statement saying that the Senate-passed health care bill was bad enough, with its half trillion dollars in Medicare cuts and $494 billion in tax increases, but that the House version would slash Medicare by an additional $60 billion, and hike taxes by at least another $150 billion. "There's a reason why a majority of Americans opposed the earlier health care plan, and today's new legislation just makes a very bad bill much worse," Murkowski said.

Murkowski also took exception to a portion of the health care measure that changed the student loan program. "I'm also disappointed that the majority party decided to add a major government takeover of the student loan program to the health care measure," she said. Under this proposal, Murkowski said, all students would be forced to borrow their federal student loans from the U.S. Department of Education. This she said would not be good because the department would borrow the money from the treasury at 2 percent interest and loan it to students at a rate up to 6.8 percent interest.

"Proponents of the partisan health care bill say that the public will like the bill once it is passed," Murkowski said. "Will they like a half trillion dollars in new taxes to help pay for a massive government expansion of health care? At a time when the nation's debt has reached historically high levels, and the economy remains in a deep recession with unemployment hovering near 10 percent, this is the wrong bill at the wrong time. At more than $2.6 trillion. the cost of the legislation in its first 10 years of full implementation, we cannot afford it."

Begich, on the other hand, said passage of the bill will enable reforms that will ease the worries and burdens of American families. 'Alaskans have been told the sky will fall if health reform passes, but that's just not true,' Begich said in a news release. "The Senate bill contains the toughest insurance reforms in history. It creates a health insurance pool so people can get more affordable coverage. Americans who have insurance now get the peace of mind of knowing they won't lose it if they get sick or change jobs. Reform ends the status quo of families going broke because of unpaid medical bills."

Congressman Young voted along the Republican party line and cast a no vote. He said in a statement that with the bill, "the people's House turned its back on the people.

'Today, a bill was rammed down the throats of good Americans who trust us to preserve their freedoms, and today, those freedoms were stifled," Young said in statement. Young said that the bill is "composed of ego and partisanship, and does nothing to help Alaskans and nothing to help our country." Young said that the U.S. healthcare system still is "the greatest in the world with more qualified experts who generate more exciting medical breakthroughs than any other nation on earth." Yet, he said in the same statement that he worries more about the decline of doctors and health care providers than about insurance coverage. He said the proposed bureaucracy, and potential elimination of free market forces, would quickly lead to rampant inefficiency and rising costs.

Gov. Parnell also voiced sharp criticism, insinuating that the bill could be unconstitutional. In a statement he expressed "grave concern" with the passage of the health care bill. "This is public policy at its worst," Parnell said. He maintains that the mandatory health care coverage for all Americans is "forcing citizens into a health care plan they don't want, and one the nation cannot afford, which could be unconstitutional.

Parnell directed attorney general Dan Sullivan to conduct a legal review of the legislation. Parnell has been a critic of the legislation and signed a letter drafted by 19 Republican governors urging congressional leaders to regroup and pass "meaningful health care reform."

On the state level in the Alaska Legislature, House Speaker Mike Chenault, R-Nikiski, and nine other Representatives sponsored a resolution calling on the Alaska delegation to vote against health care reform. The resolution also requested the governor to review the constitutionality of the Nebraska Compromise that guaranteed Nebraskans would receive a break to pay for expanded access to Medicaid benefits. The resolution's sponsor statement said that this exemption was granted in order to obtain Sen. Ben Nelson's vote in order to get the 60 votes needed to send the health care reform legislation to the Senate floor. Vermont, Florida and Louisiana also received special deals in order to get senators' votes to reach the 60-vote threshold.

While Republicans blasted the health care bill, the Alaska Democratic party chairwoman Patti Higgins welcomed the news of the bill's passage, saying, "On this day, we bear witness to one of the most historic legislative accomplishments in a generation. President Obama and the Democrats had the courage and vision to fight one more time for affordable health care for all Americans. Today, every American won."

She said that it is a basic American value that all have access to affordable health care and with this legislation, about to be signed by the president, it would allow 32 million more people just to have that. "The Alaska Democratic Party is proud of our Democratic leaders, especially Sen. Mark Begich. His leadership in supporting legislation that the non-partisan Congressional Budget Office has found will reduce the deficit by hundreds of billions of dollars over the next two decades has been astounding. We are grateful for the tens of thousands of lives and billions of dollars that will be saved because of what was accomplished this day," Higgins said.

The Senate approved the bill on Dec. 24. The House made amendments to the Senate version of the bill and approved it with a vote of 220 to 211. The revisions are going to be before the Senate later this week. The entire bill is then going to the president to be signed into law.

Babcock replied that a letter to the Justice Department would be sent tomorrow (Tuesday, March 23). "We need a resolution to put in the letter," she explained. At the March 8 council meeting, City Manager Josie Bahnke said the city attorney had advised her to write to the Justice Department for permission under the Voting Rights Act to schedule a recall election.

Councilman Jon Larson said that after reading statutes and talking with the city attorney, he believes the council is required to authorize a special election on the question of recalling the school board, but he wants the public to understand that voting for the resolution indicates no opinion on the issue.

In other action, the council unanimously approved a resolution accepting a fee proposal from RSA Engineering to handle the bidding process and construction administration phase for the Nome Elementary School boilers replacement and Nome swimming pool upgrades.

RSA prepared a lump sum fee proposal of $12,580 for mechanical and electrical engineering services for the bid phase. The RSA proposal for construction administration services is on a time and expense basis with a not-to-exceed fee of $13,650 for the projects.

RSA currently is under contract with the city for the design of the swimming pool mechanical upgrades and for the design of the elementary school boilers replacement.

The council unanimously adopted a resolution to request funding from the FY11 Payment in Lieu of Taxes Program, Department of Commerce. Community and Economic Development. A city in the unorganized borough qualifies for the funding if:

• the city has conducted a regular election during the preceding state fiscal year and has reported the election results to the commissioner of DCCED;

· the city's governing body has conducted regular meetings and maintained a record of the proceedings; and

• ordinances adopted by the city have been codified in accordance with AS 29.235.050.

City manager's report

Bahnke's report to the council included an update on the roof replacement project for Buildings D and E at Nome-Beltz High School in a memo dated March 5 from Steve Cropsey of Aurora SMC Inc. to Jon Wehde, superintendent of Nome Public Schools. Contracts were presented to William Brill of Weatherguard Inc. as the low bidder for the roofing project at a pre-construction meeting Feb. 23 at the offices of NorthWind Architects, Cropsey reported.

According to Cropsey's memo, Brill said construction will begin this summer upon arrival of the first barge in Nome and will be completed by July 30. Brill also said his company intends to hire as many Nome workers as possible. Employment information is available from Scott Belenski, Weatherguard's project superintendent, by e-mail at www.scott@weatherguardinc.net or by phone at (360)

Bahnke said three tasks involving the city attorney were not completed in time for the council meeting on Monday, so she requested a special council meeting to address them. Council members agreed to meet at noon Tuesday, March 30 on these topics: (1) A contract for veterinary services; (2) a memorandum of agreement between the city and Nome Public Schools regarding management of the boiler replacement project; and (3) a contract for computer software for the city finance department and the city clerk's office.

Bahnke asked the council to schedule a work session to review and discuss a procedural manual and an investigation manual developed for the Nome Police Department by Chief John Papasodora. Some council members have travel plans for the near future, so selection of a meeting date was postponed.

Comments on Iditarod 2010

Councilwoman Mary Knodel said it had been a great Iditarod. She thanked Utility Manager John Handeland for the bright new LED Christmas lights on Front Street. Larson said organizers had put together a great Iditarod basketball tournament.

Speaking on behalf of the Iditarod Trail Committee, Handeland thanked the city for helping to make the 2010 Iditarod a wonderful event. "Every city department was involved and there were no hitches," he said.

Bahnke also praised city personnel for working around the clock for a week during Iditarod. She plans to hold a debriefing meeting with them and will report the overtime costs involved in their efforts to the council when the costs become available, she added.

All six council members and Mayor Denise Michels attended the meeting, which lasted about 13 minutes.

Kawerak to host fisheries summit

Kawerak will bring together fisheries experts and regional leaders to develop workable restoration and enhancement solutions for declining salmon runs in Norton Sound on May 4-6 at Pioneer Hall in Nome, reports Kawerak Fisheries Biologist Mike Sloan.

Sloan said discussion will focus on salmon in the Nome subdistrict and northern Norton Sound, with opportunities to consider other troubled salmon stocks in the region and to discuss other fisheries issues in Norton Sound and Port Clarence.

"We are looking for presenters for this event," he said. Those interested in attending or presenting during the summit, can contact Sloan for more information at (907) 443-4384 or by e-mail at www.msloan@kawerak.org.

Norton Sound Fisheries Restoration and Enhancement Summit will be funded with a grant from Norton Sound Economic Development Corp.

Trooper, National Guard training turns to real-life rescues

By the Alaska State Troopers Nome Post

On March 13, Nome-based Alaska State Troopers participated in a joint training mission with the Nome Alaska Army National Guard Air crew. The training mission was planned to enhance emergency response efforts between the two groups that play a vital role in search and rescue operations on the Seward Peninsula.

There were two Troopers on snowmachine patrol on the Nome-Golovin trail and two Troopers in the Blackhawk helicopter with the AANG crew of four. Troopers from the air were working with several communication devices to determine the best means to communicate with ground crews for future emergency responses. The training exercise coincided with the annual 200-mile, roundtrip Nome-Golovin snowmachine race.

The AANG Blackhawk crew used the racers on the trail as reference points to help the Trooper spotters practice finding individuals on the ground.

Part of the exercise was to locate a specific snowmachine, a blue and black Alaska State Trooper snowmachine on the trail. The Troopers and AANG crew were able to find the machine and practice a landing, debarkation and contact of the simulated missing person, played by an Alaska State Trooper. This training allowed the Troopers to become familiar with AANG crew procedures for emergency response with an operating Blackhawk.

The training session soon turned from a simulated response to a real-life emergency operation. Colton West, 19, of Nome, crashed his snowmachine outside of White Mountain and injured his knee. West's machine was disabled and after a Bering Air helicopter landed to check on him they radioed the AANG/Trooper team in the Blackhawk who swung into action. Trooper Aileen Witrosky and Sgt. Andrew Merrill assisted West from his wrecked machine to the Blackhawk. West was then flown to Nome where Nome Volunteer Ambulance crew members met and transported him to the hospital.

The Blackhawk headed back out onto the trail and located Troopers Honie Culley and Garrett Frost at the Safety Roadhouse. Trooper Frost and Trooper Culley were conducting trail safety checks and were encouraging those who were consuming alcohol at the roadhouse to buddyup for rides to Nome and not to drive their snowmahcines after drinking. The Blackhawk crew performed a landing at the roadhouse and Troopers were able to meet on the ground with spectators taking pictures of the sight.

While on the ground, the Blackhawk crew received word of another injured snowmachiner. The injured rider was being attended to by a Bering Air helicopter pilot and was complaining of back pain. The Blackhawk met up with the Bering Air helicopter and picked up the gentleman who was then flown to Nome where the ambulance crew transferred him to the hospital.

With the training day winding down, Troopers and the AANG crew prepared to call it a day when one more call for help from the trail was received. Ross Outwater, 26, of Nome, was on the return portion of the race when he hit an object on the trail near Topkok. Nome Volunteer Search and Rescue and Fire Department personnel were on scene and requested assistance. NVFD and search and rescue crews cared for Outwater at the Topkok shelter cabin until the Blackhawk arrived and transported him to Nome. The training mission was successful and proved beneficial for not only the Troopers and AANG crew but also for racers in the Nome-Golovin race.

The Alaska State Troopers thank the Nome AANG Blackhawk crew, Nome Volunteer Ambulance crew, Nome Volunteer Fire Department and Search and Rescue crew, Bering Air pilots, and everyone who assisted with the race and training.

Program offers a guide through the federal maze

Marine Advisory Program to offer workshops on federal environmental policy and fisheries council

By Laurie McNicholas

The Alaska Sea Grant Marine Advisory Program reports that it is developing an educational workshop on the National Environmental Protection Act and the North Pacific Fishery Management Council for use in rural Alaska communities.

The National Sea Grant Law Center provided funds for the outreach training program.

Western Alaska residents face resource development issues such as proposed offshore oil and gas exploration, major mining operations and commercial groundfish fisheries in federal waters that potentially can affect the environment and their way of life. The MAP training workshops are intended to assist and encourage them to participate in processes of the NEPA and NPFMC

The NEPA, which became law in 1970, establishes national environmental policy and goals for the protection, maintenance and enhancement of the environment, and it provides a process for implementing the goals within federal agencies. The public has a vital role in the NEPA process in providing input on what issues should be addressed in an Environmental Impact Statement and in commenting on the findings in an agency's NEPA documents.

The NPFMC is one of eight regional councils established by the Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act in 1976 to oversee management of the nation's fisheries. The council has jurisdiction over the 900,000-square-mile Exclusive Economic Zone off Alaska. The council is primarily responsible for groundfish management in the Gulf of Alaska and Bering Sea and Aleutian Islands, including cod, pollock, flatfish, mackerel, sablefish and rockfish species harvested mainly by trawlers, hookand-line longliners and pot fishermen. Some of the management plans developed by the council involve preparation of an EIS.

The council currently is considering management measures to reduce chum salmon bycatch in the Bering Sea pollock fishery. Bycatch is the incidental harvest of a species other than the kind a fishery is targeting. The council also is developing a research plan for the Northern Bering Sea Research Area, which extends north from Nelson Island to a boundary above Little Diomede Island. These issues are drawing growing numbers of western Alaskans to council meetings to provide testimony.

The Marine Advisory Program

plans to conduct training workshops for residents of southwestern Alaska, the Aleutian Islands, the Yukon-Kuskokwim Delta and the Bering Strait region. The workshops will:

· provide an overview of the pertinent laws and processes of NEPA and NPFMC;

• provide background on laws that established the NEPA and NPFMC and explain the objectives of the laws and processes;

• explain in detail how to provide meaningful and substantive testimony in response to requests for such participation to encourage active involvement by coastal residents;

· work with coastal residents to review and critique written and oral testimony, to help ensure that their voices are heard in public testimony.

The training program will focus on collaboration with existing programs, including the new Rural Outreach Committee of the NPFMC. The committee is planning outreach meetings on chum bycatch management measures in several western Alaska communities in February and March of 2011.

Minutes of a Rural Outreach Committee meeting held last month in Anchorage report that MAP Program Leader Paula Cullenberg and Bubba Cook of the World Wildlife Fund said they would collaborate to develop an educational workshop on processes of NEPA and the council. Cullenberg is a member of the committee. The WWF has obtained funds for the project from the Patrick Foundation.

Plans call for conducting workshops in five Alaska communities. Ideally, the workshops would be held prior to the committee's outreach meetings on chum salmon bycatch and in some of the same communities or regions where the committee's outreach meetings are scheduled. The committee recommended that the council support the educational workshop initiative by having staff work with MAP and WWF to review educational materials and participate in workshop development.

Those who wish to participate in the training sessions can contact Izetta

Chambers at the MAP office in Dillingham at (907) 842-8323 or through email at izetta.chambers@alaska.edu.

Chambers was raised in Naknek, a Bristol Bay fishing and seafood processing community. She received a bachelor of science degree in business management in 2001 and a law degree in 2008, both from the University of Arizona. She and her family own and operate Naknek Family Fisheries, a seafood direct-marketing business that processes and sells premium-quality, quick-frozen salmon fillets.

Chambers anticipates that workshops on NEPA and NPFMC processes will include trainings to coincide with RurAL CAP's Rural Providers' Conference or the Alaska Federation of Natives Convention this year. "We have had an overwhelming amount of statewide support for this effort, and I look forward to bringing this education program to our rural coastal communities affected by these laws and processes," she wrote in an e-mail to The Nome Nugget.

LAST CLIMB—DeeDee Jonrowe works her way toward the top of Cape Nome before making a descent back to the Bering Sea for the final stretch to Nome March 18. With only eight dogs left on her team since not far beyond the race's halfway point, Jonrowe displayed true grit in making it to Nome.

other year before dog teams paraded down Nome's main drag. The rings showed just how hard this race is—and how tough those are who race it, no matter if they finish first or last.

Those rings came courtesy of a broken nose Davis suffered well before the halfway point of the race.

The result of an unfortunate encounter with a tree in the Dalzell Gorge, the broken nose didn't deter the Iditarod rookie from Montana from pressing on. According to a story in the Montana Standard newspaper of Butte, Mont., Davis had sent a post card home to her parents in nearby Deer Lodge, Mont., with a short message from McGrath—"Doing great. Broke my nose. Beautiful state."

Davis, indeed, did do great. Her finish in 13 days, five hours, six minutes and 40 seconds set the mark for speedy red lantern recipients, besting the previous fastest run by more than a full day. Davis' early arrival meant there would be no red lantern banquet this year. While David Straub crossed the line in 2002 as the main awards banquet was underway, no other race has seen all the mushers arrive in Nome before the traditional Sunday evening celebration has started.

The previous fastest run from the tail-end of the pack came in 2002, when that year's frontrunner, Martin Buser, also set the mark for the speediest Iditarod finish ever. While this year's winner mushed into the record books himself, Lance Mackey's eight-day, 23-hour and 59-minute win fell just over an hour short of Buser's record.

It wasn't Buser's record against which Mackey was racing. His record was to be set for consistency, not speed. He had a full hour to bask in the glow of an unprecedented fourth straight victory before runner-up Hans Gatt or his team would set a foot or paw on Front Street. No other musher has dominated the Iditarod so consistently. A handful have won three in a row, but no other has taken four straight wins.

Mackey's ability to make long runs on little rest for both him and his dogs has been his signature on the race. Both Gatt, the winner of this year's Yukon Quest, and King fielded teams that looked strong and clearly capable of delivering a win. Mackey simply outlasted them. "It looks like I was the weak link and wasn't the one who could keep up with the race," Gatt said. King said he couldn't—and wouldn't—run his dogs as long as Mackey had.

Mackey defended his marathon style of mushing. "I'm proud of [my dogs], proud of the way we drive them. And I would never do anything to jeopardize the future of my team," he said at the awards banquet Sunday evening at the Nome Recreation Center.

Mackey rolled the dice in his move to the coast by blowing through the Kaltag checkpoint and making a 140-mile run to Unalakleet. The gamble paid off as Mackey was able to grab the lead from former champ and veteran musher Jeff King, keeping him and Gatt—and their formidable teams—in the rearview mirror the entire journey down the coast. "I have the most talented dog mushers in the world breathing down my neck," Mackey said upon finishing the race the afternoon of March 16.

Whether or not Mackey will put his hat in the ring to try and extend the streak and match Rick Swenson as the only musher to win five total races, appears up in the air. Mackey's comments after winning this year's race have leaned more toward the possibility of a new musher taking a turn at the top. A physically strained Mackey said it may be time for a break. "To be honest, I'm kind of sick and tired of being sick and tired," Mackey told the awards banquet audience. "And I don't know if I'm coming back for a while."

In addition to alluding to the need to tend to his own health, Mackey noted plans to race in other locales, including the Lower 48 and Scandinavia and Russia. Mackey said a race he has planned to attend that would traverse Norway, Sweden, Finland and end in Russia is slated for the same timeframe as the Iditarod next year.

Mackey has also mentioned several times since his win that his son, Cain, will be old enough to run the Iditarod next year and is itching to following in his father's footsteps. Mackey said he is considering putting his son behind his team to race. "I have a boy who just turned 18 who really wants a [finisher's] belt buckle," he said at the finish line. "It would make me equally as proud to see him finish a race as to win a fifth."

For as many reasons as Mackey came up with not to run the race, he would not say he would for certain be out of the running. "It will definitely be hard to not come back for a fifth," he told the banquet audience.

One man who did not leave room for speculation as to next year or any race in the near future was Iditarod icon King. This year's third-place finisher, King roared into the finish chute nearly 2 1/2 hours after Mackey with a hard-charging team that looked like it would have gone on to Teller had he wanted it to. Smiling and congenial under the Burled Arch, King said he was hanging up the harnesses after 29 years.

Apparently, King has had a difficult time convincing people that he's really done.

As King took the stage to accept his third-place trophy Sunday night, he said he's had to ask people what part of "done" they didn't understand. "It really is my last Iditarod," he said. "I will miss you. I will be back in some form. ...But [racing the Iditarod] is certainly not in my future."

King claimed his first of four Iditarod wins in 1993 and his last in 2006, the year before Mackey started his four-year string of victories. With both possessing larger-than-life personalities, much has been made of a rivalry between the two. King was runner-up to Mackey in 2008 and was in the hunt with a fifth-place finish in 2007.

Mackey, however, downplayed any perceived animosity between

spurred relief for the Nomeite. He was on the homestretch in familiar territory. He was also winning.

Hofstetter was the first to cross the line in this year's Iditarod Trail Invitational race in Nome, pedaling his fat-tire bike from Knik Lake to Nome in 17 days, nine hours and 30 minutes. Hofstetter was followed in by Jay and Tracey Petervary of Jackson Hole, Wyo., about a day later.

The trio were the only ones to continue biking after the majority of racers finished the competition's main attraction, a 350-mile race from Knik Lake to McGrath. Those who don't find that punishing enough continue on to complete the 1,000 miles to Nome. A pair of walkers also made the trek this year. Tom Jarding of Pennsylvania set a race record of 20 days, 14 hours and 45 minutes, completing the route in the early hours of Sunday morning. Jarding was followed in by fellow Pennsylvanian Tim Hewitt who amazingly finished his fifth trek to Nome for the race, resting under the Burled Arch Monday evening just after it had been moved from the center of Front Street to its resting place next to City Hall.

Perhaps even more amazing was the arrival of a fourth biker on the trail Sunday evening. Mike Curiak, an Iditarod Trail Invitational veteran and record holder for the bike race to Nome, set out again this year, but not as part of the race. While the racers supply themselves with rations sent out before the race's start and stay inside checkpoints and other shelters, Curiak eschewed all of that.

Using a bike that was adapted to carry gear in every nook and cranny possible, Curiak traveled the trail hauling all his food and gear with him. From start to finish he never slept inside nor picked up any gear or food along the way. His bike weighed 145 pounds when he started from Willow. His body likely weighed considerably less once he hit Nome than when he started. He arrived in Nome Sunday evening as the Iditarod mushers and crew were finishing their overstuffed plates of prime rib.

For Hofstetter, it was the second attempt to bike to Nome. The resolute Nomeite gave it a try two years ago and pushed his body too hard and had to drop out after completing about twothirds of the course. Last year he jumped back in the ring, but limited himself to racing to Mc-Grath in what became a slog in deep snow.

This year. Hofstetter saw a return of the swelling that pushed him out of the race two years ago after a grueling push from Rainey Pass to Rohn. "I felt horrible," he said. "I was going for 26 hours straight before breaking trail over the pass in a storm."

After being caught up in the competition of racing with a large pack of bikers, Hofstetter had to let the field continue on and take extra rest in Rohn before continuing. The move proved critical for his race. "I was able to get on my own pace and felt really good after that," he said.

While the extra rest may have cost him a few places for the race into McGrath, Hofstetter's sights were set farther afield. "It felt really good [leaving McGrath.] My attitude was real positive about continuing," he said. A positive attitude would be critical to carry him through a few more sleepless pushes in temperatures that would plummet to -40°F along the Yukon River. "You just had to keep moving. It's real perilous. You're on the edge. You can't make any mistakes," Hofstetter said.

Hofstetter said each stressful incident and close call on the trek seemed to be met with a corresponding moment of good fortune. At one point along the Yukon, Hofstetter said he stepped into overflow that ended up soaking his foot. He dumped the water out of his boot and continued on with a soaked foot. Knowing that there were no structures in recent history along that part of the trail, Hofstetter said he was really starting to worry about his foot when a man suddenly appeared along the route. "We call it trail magic. This guy appears almost like an apparition. He points and says, 'There's a cabin, it's all heated for you," he said.

The man had been flying over to drop off supplies for the racers when he spotted the trio of bikers travelling together. He knew the Bureau of Land Management had just built a cabin nearby and decided to ready it for the weary racers. "It seemed like a lot on this trip, things were going my way, or our way, where things got better instead of getting worse," Hofstetter said.

While he lucked out with the cabin that night, there were two nights on the trail where he had to stop and sleep out in the open. Hofstetter said he would set out pine boughs on which he would place his pad and sleeping bag. He admitted he really didn't get much sleep in the extreme cold. "I felt like I could always get up and keep going to keep warm," he said.

Hofstetter said he traveled a fair amount of the trail with the Petervarys, not so much out of design but out of circumstance. Whoever would get in the lead would inevitably have the other party catch up since they were able to benefit from the freshly broke trail. But in a move similar to Lance Mackey's in the Iditarod, Hofstetter decided to hit the gas going into Unalakleet. "I don't know where it came from, but I just kept going and going," he said. "It was familiar trail once I hit Unalakleet, Almost all the riding was in high gear. I was able to stand up and pound out the miles. I really just wanted to get home and I didn't want to stop until I got there."

From Unalakleet to Nome, Hofstetter slept a total of seven hours between Monday and Wednesday night. From Elim on, the last 140 miles of trail, he didn't sleep at all.

Much of Hofstetter's motivation was to get home to his young daughter, Hahnah, and wife Sarah.

As he neared that goal Wednesday night, another biker prepared on the outskirts of Nome to join Hofstetter for the final couple of miles to the arch. Nora Nagaruk pedaled alongside Phil for the finish to help celebrate yet another trek he has accomplished in her name to raise funds to battle leukemia.

Hofstetter has used his Iditarod Trail Invitational races to help spur people to donate to Leukemia and Lymphoma Society. Nagaruk has battled her way to being leukemia free. In addition to the insane bike races, Hofstetter has also rowed a kayak from Nome to Barrow in an effort to raise funds. Hofstetter reports raising more than $1,500 from his latest effort toward a total goal of $23,000. The tally right now toward that grand tally stands at $21,500. Donations can still be made at www.active.com/donate/roro.

As Hofstetter and Nagaruk crossed under the Burled Arch Wednesday night, a throng of cheerers welcomed him home, complete with a handheld siren to mimic the alert given to let people know Iditarod mushers are making their way in.

Hofstetter said the trek gave him a sense of accomplishment and satisfaction, but would not go as far as saying he enjoyed himself. "It was just an incredible feeling to come back home. Last year I had a lot of fun. This year, with the cold and going to Nome, it wasn't as fun for me. Everything seemed so intense."

Old St. Joe's again overflows with talent

Results and information provided by Angela Hansen

Artists from Nome and surrounding villages competed in the 11th Annual Iditarod Fine Art Show sponsored by the Nome Arts Council and Nome Community Center.

The show was held at Old St. Joseph Hall March 15-20. There were 108 youth and adult entries adorning the display racks and tables. This year's judges were Donna Gates King and Lisa Fredricks of Denali, and Lee Haugen of Nome. The judges commented that they were impressed by the incredible talent from a 2 1/2year-old to experienced artists, and encouraged artists to push their limits in creativity and technique and to explore outside their comfort zone. They were also amazed by the wide variety and quality of art exhibited.

A reception was held March 19, during which time the public enjoyed refreshments while admiring the artwork and visiting with the artists. Event organizer Angela Hansen extended a welcome and thanked those who participated in and helped with the show. Special thanks went to Delores Orman for helping run the show, Christina Perrigo for typing all the artist information cards and to Cheryl Thompson for making the art and craft show possible in Old St. Joe's. Donna Gates King made comments on the show before Orman and Hansen announced the winners as they came forward to accept their prize money.

The votes for the People's Choice Award were tallied and this year's winner is "Taking Off Eagle," a bone, antler, muskox horn and baleen sculpture by 10-year-old Charlie Weyauvanna. Also drawn were the winners of the three raffled pieces of artwork. The prizes were watercolor prints by Katie O'Connor, Angela Hansen and Heidi Hart. The lucky winners were Jim Hansen, Graciana Kristenson and Karen Olanna. To end the program, Hansen said it was another outstanding year exhibiting local artwork and encouraged people to begin their showpieces for next year's 12th Annual Iditarod Fine Art Show.

him and King. "I have the utmost respect and admiration for him," he said at Sunday's banquet.

Mackey joined in the crowd expressing suspicion that King would-or could-stay out of the race too long. "He's going to be the Brett Favre of our sport," Mackey said. "It will certainly be strange not to see Jeff King on the trail."

Others shared in paying a bit of homage to King. "A lot of us give you some flack sometimes for being such an intense competitor," said Hugh Neff in acknowledging King's contributions to the sport.

As King exited the stage, the room rose to its feet and applauded the musher whose innovations have altered everything from sled design to training regimens for the sport.

King remarked on just a few of the changes he had seen in his many races, most notably the care the dogs receive. "It's been years since I've seen a dog team being over-driven," he said.

King isn't the only top-tier musher who is promising to step off the trail next year leaving the gate open for new talent to rise through the ranks. Gatt and Sebastian Schnuelle have both said they will not be returning.

The opening in the gate leaves room for some perennial strong mushers as well as up-and-coming drivers who have perhaps been overshadowed by the advent of the Mackey dynasty. With mushers like Ken Anderson, John Baker, Ramey Smyth, Dallas and Mitch Seavey, Hugh Neff, Ray Redington Jr. and Zack Steer all rolling into Nome within an eight-hour stretch after this year's three leaders crossed the line, a 2011 race without that top trio would still be anything but boring.

But then again, there was no absolute commitment from Mackey to Old and in the frav

One musher who is pledging to push on while many of Iditarod's fixtures are bowing out is Jim Lanier.

Lanier took the stage before the mushers' procession at the end of the finishers' banquet to accept this year's Mushers Choice Award. At a spry 69, Lanier said he was surprised to be honored with the choice by his fellow competitors. "I'm really blown away," he said.

Lanier said he had to believe that his age had nothing to with his selection this year. But as he works his way to becoming one of the race's elder statesmen, he couldn't help but muse on the future of his mushing career. "How can I not come back so I can do it when I'm 70 years old?" Lanier said.

But Lanier said he would not be content to stop just there. While Mackey had his eyes set on a fourth straight win, Lanier is targeting Col. Norman Vaughn's mark as the most senior musher to finish the race when he completed his fourth Iditarod in 1988 at the age of 88.

If Lanier were indeed to run the race at 88, it would occur in the year 2029. With the running of the All Alaska Sweepstakes now seemingly running on a 25-year schedule, Lanier figured he might as well toss his hat in the ring for that race too in 2033. "I will be only 92 and I intend to run that race," Lanier said.

A perfect score of zero

Arguably the happiest person in the room Sunday evening at the awards banquet wasn't a musher. When Iditarod Chief Veterinarian Stu Nelson took the stage, he beamed as if he just won the race himself. With more than 1,000 dogs on the trail this year, not one dog perished during the race. "I'm a happy guy. This was the greatest race ever," he said from the podium, leading the crowd in a cheer. Ultimately we were richly blessed.'

This was the first race in which no dogs died. Nelson said good trail and weather conditions were favorable to the dogs this year. While mushers suffered through frigid temperatures along the Yukon that plummeted to -40°F and colder, the deep freeze benefitted the canine athletes. Nelson said optimal temperatures for the dogs range from lows of -10 to -20 with highs around zero.

Nelson said it was almost a perfect storm of conditions and care. He said the knowledge base of mushers and the veterinarians continues to grow each year. "It was such a wonderful race. God was really looking out for us this year," Nelson said.

If a higher power, indeed, had an eve out for the Iditarod, the race's veterinarians were also certainly doing their part. Veteran musher Martin Buser marveled at the perseverance of the doggy doctors along the Yukon as the temperatures tanked. Buser joked of frozen stethoscopes sticking straight out from the veterinarians' necks as they worked they arrived at the checkpoints. This year the Golden Stethoscope award was given to Caroline Griffitts for the veterinarian deemed the most helpful by the mushers.

People weren't the only ones receiving awards. Mackey's lead dog, Maple, was awarded the City of Nome Lolly Medley Golden Harness Award. "She let it all out this year," Mackey said, noting she ran single lead for most of the race.

Working in the other direction, one of the most coveted awards of the night was bestowed to musher Schnuelle. The Alaska Airlines Leonhard Seppala Humanitarian Award honors the musher who in the opinion of the veterinarians takes the best care of his dogs. To be eligible, the musher must have finished in the top 20. While accepting the award, Schnuelle talked of Austin, a dog that has run every long-distance race the Germanborn musher has raced. Schnuelle said he got Austin from a friend who had found the dog at the pound. "He's run 11,000 miles and I have no idea how old he is," Schnuelle said.

Unfortunately for Schnuelle, his expert dog care was not the only reason he was discussed on stage. At last year's banquet a wager involving a hair cut was tendered on stage between Mackey, who sports a long ponytail, and Schnuelle with his wild, frizzy locks. The winner was to cut off the loser's hair.

Mackey brought the issue back up almost as an afterthought during his speech. "A friend of mine made a bet with me last year," Mackey said. "Sebastian, I'm not going to let you off." Mackey said he had discussed the bet with Schnuelle, who was understandably none too excited about the offer for a free haircut.

Mackey said he would let Schnuelle go for the moment since he had some public engagements to attend to in the near future. But Mackey promised there would be a public haircutting sometime soon that could serve as a fundraiser. "We're going to cut his hair in the future to raise some money for Logan. So if anybody wants to buy some of Sebastian's hair, I think it's going to be available soon," Mackey said.

The Logan to whom Mackey referred is Logan Erickson, a 9-yearold boy from Unalakleet with autism. Logan had never uttered a word until after meeting DeeDee Jonrowe's little dog, Mr. Miyagi, during a visit to Unalakleet. After Jonrowe had departed from the airport with Mr. Miyagi, Erickson walked about the terminal repeating the dog's name.

The connection spurred Jonrowe and the Ericksons to pursue a service dog to help Logan. Service dogs and the training that comes along with them are expensive to the tune of more than $13,000. Jonrowe has used her public presence as an Iditarod musher to help raise funds for the cause through a program called 4 Paws for Logan. More can be learned at www.4pawsforlogan.com.

In the neighborhood

A familiar face for Western Alaska spent his fair share of time of the stage Sunday evening. Unalakleet Mayor Middy Johnson was honored with the Seppala Heritage Grant that helped pay for his expenses to get him into the race. The grant is designed to help rookie mushers who show a commitment to working dogs and strong character traits to get into the race.

Johnson had received the award late last summer and was given the final payment on stage Sunday evening.

Despite being a rookie Johnson has strong ties to the race. His grandfather, Henry Ivanoff, was the musher who handed the serum to the grant's namesake, Leonhard Seppala, during the 1925 serum run to Nome to stave off a potential diphtheria epidemic. Johnson said as he crossed Norton Sound out of Shaktoolik during the race, he imagined that he must have been crossing his grandfather's tracks as the trail zigged and zagged about as a result of jumbled sea ice. "It was a peaceful travel for that portion of time," Johnson said.

Johnson was also honored with the Northern Air Cargo Herbie Nayokpuk Award, honoring the Shishmaref Cannonball by its presentation to the musher who best exemplifies his spirit. That wasn't all Johnson was going to take home from Northern Air Cargo as he also had a bit of luck with a four-wheeler key. For the last few years, NAC has also offered a four-wheeler to one musher who has finished the race. Each musher draws a key from a jar with only one available that will start the machine.

As he approached the stage, Johnson handed his key to his son, who gave it try. The lights shone as the engine fired up. It was just another perk in a race that almost seemed scripted for Johnson. Everything seemed to click for him, he said. "From the start going down Fourth Avenue in Anchorage, the dogs acted like they had done this 100 times before," he said.

Boys score second, girls grab fourth at state

The Nome Nanooks boys basketball team suffered its fourth and hardest loss of the season in Anchorage March 17 at the hands of Haines.

By a margin of a single point, Nome just missed bringing home a state championship trophy. A last-second steal by Haines' Kyle Fossman as Nanook Mason Evans drove the lane cemented the 46-45 Glacier Bear advantage on the scoreboard and sent Nome home with a second-place trophy for the second year in a row.

The game was a see-saw effort with Haines exiting the first quarter with a 9-8 lead. The Glacier Bears took that lead and ran with it in the second, going into the locker room at halftime with a 27-16 cushion. Whatever Nanook coach Pat Callahan said to the boys at the half put them back on their feet as Nome responded in the third quarter with an 18-7 effort to tie the game at 34.

Haines scored the game's final basket with about 2 1/2 minutes left on the clock. Nome had the possession with approximately 20 seconds on the clock. As those seconds ticked away, Evans made his move, spurring Fossman to make his. With the ball in Haines' hands, the Fossman, the 2008 player of the year, led all scorers in the game with 23 points. Nome was led by this year's player of the year, Jeremy Head, and Mikey Wongittilin who both put up 14 points. Christian Leckband added a dozen points and Tim Sullivan chipped in five. Leckband and Head were named to the all-tournament team.

Lady Nanooks rebound to grab fourth

Nome slipped into the fourth-place match against Glennallen after a 23-21 win against Monroe Catholic March 16.

The Lady Nanooks came back strong March 17 for the fourth-place match against the Panthers, winning the game 34-12. A strong defensive effort held Glennallen to single digits in all four quarters, with the Panthers only able to put up two points in each of the second, third and fourth quarters.

Nome was led in the effort by Devynn Johnson's baker's dozen 13 points. Richelle Horner netted eight points while Hilary Stiles added five. Iris Warnke-Green scored four points and Renee Lammer and Chloe Mattheis both scored two in the win. Johnson and Warnke-Green were named to the all-tournament team.

The Panthers were led by Jubilee Sutherland who put up half the team's points with six. She was followed by Rachel Stumpf with four points.

Nome put up pretty even scoring throughout the game, netting nine in the first quarter, five in the second and 10 in both the third and fourth quarters. Nome landed 15 of 33 shots for the game, a 45 percent shooting average. The Lady Nanooks were one of three from the three-point line and one of two from the foul line.

36th Lonnie O'Connor tourney delivers tight games

Tournament information provided by Kimberly O'Connor

Despite having two teams fewer among the ranks, the competition at this year's Lonnie O'Connor Iditarod Basketball Classic was perhaps among the fiercest ever.

In it's 36th year, 34 teams descended on the Nome Recreation Center for a full week of hoops. While past tournaments saw a number of blowouts in the early rounds as the top teams made their way through the competition to finally meet for semifinal and final games, the action was tight right out of the gate this year in all of the divisions. "I think we had a couple less teams, but the quality of games all week was awesome. From day one, we had very good games," said tournament organizer Kimberly O'Connor.

In addition to the adult matches, the little guys and girls got a chance on the court for two pee-wee games coached by Lorlie Shield. This year was her 10th year coaching the pee-wee league and players from her first year were on the Nome Nanook boys team that took runner-up honors this year at state.

The crowd was also treated to a performance from Tanya Crevier, the world's greatest female basketball handler, who gave two shows at LOIBC. She impressed the audience, both young and old, with her basketball handling skills. Among her feats, Crevier dribbled four balls at once, spun 10 balls at one time, spun a ball while holding a spoon and feeding two young girls pudding at the same time, and juggled with bowling pins and basketballs.

The Alaska Missions, hosted by the Nome Community Baptist Church, did concession this year for the third time. Brenda Crim, from Anchorage, is their leader who coordinated about 150 volunteers to come to Nome this year to help sell concessions at LOIBC and help out at other Iditarod events. Proceeds from the concessions will be donated to Bering Sea Women's Group and Paws for Logan, a fundraiser for Logan Erickson of Unalakleet. Jake Sherman made this year's chili, which sold out fast.

Division summaries

Men's Over 40: Elim got second place this year after going two and out for many years. This year a couple Nome players, Uly Hall and Al Haddadi, moved to the Elim team to even out the division. This made games more competitive.

Ladies' Open: This division is slowly increasing in size while the Ladies' B division is getting smaller. Airport Pizza lost their first game against Bethel Crowley. However, they won each game thereafter and took first place against Shishmaref. Airport Pizza was coached by former Nome-Betz High School Nanook Coach Bill Jack. Two of his daughters, Mori Busk and Dana Jabaay, played on the team along with other girls that Bill coached here in Nome. Bill also coached the 1982/1983 Nome Nanook Boys team which took first place at the state tournament. Some of those players are playing in the Men's Over 40 division today.

Ladies' B: This division was small, with only three teams. Instead of a double-elimination tournament we held a round-robin tournament. Each team lost one game each so the teams that won by the most points advanced to the finals and played each other for first and second place. BSNC (who had the lower city league standing) ended up beating Kawerak for first place.

Men's Open: Men's A and Open were combined this year due to Open only having three teams. Most of the teams appreciated this because it allowed them to have more games. Shishmaref lost their second game by a single point to Nome Machine Works and won every game thereafter. They ended up playing Nome Machine Works for first place and won 89 to 57.

Men's B: Q Trucking won every game this year and took first place against Shishmaref. They had a roster of seven players and didn't play together as a Nome City League team. Willis Pate Jr., the Charlie Hungerford MVP, didn't play much high school basketball but is playing ball while attending AVTEC in Seward. Pate did very well in this tournament scoring points and rebounding. Q Trucking beat Shishmaref in the semi-final game by five points and beat them by three points in the championship game.

Sportsmanship awards

Ladies B: Honoring Lucie Trigg who is a (probably for 20 years now) ANB Volunteer who sells T-shirts, raffle tickets and takes admission during the tournament.

Men's B: In Memory of David Paniptchuk, who was from Unalakleet and Golovin, and volunteered at Unalakleet by keeping score for basketball games, played basketball and opened the gym in the evenings for the community of Unalakleet.

Ladies' Open: Honoring Rich and Rachel Stasenko of Shishmaref. They are an elder couple from Shishmaref who come to watch LOIBC each

Men's Open: In Memory of Andrew Goldsberry from Nome. Andrew was instrumental is putting together several teams to play in the LOIBC. He put together his last team in 2009 even though he suffered from back pain. He didn't play much in 2009 due to his back pain, but he was always happy, polite and displayed great sportsmanship on and off the court. I really missed his phone call this year to sign up his team and his smiling face.

Men's Over 40: Honoring Larry Howard from Seattle who retired from Northland Services a few years ago. Larry always made it a point to visit us at the gym during the week of Iditarod to make sure we received our sponsorship money and that the Northland banner was hung at the north side of the gym.

BSSD picks new superintendent

By Diana Haecker

The Bering Strait School District will have a new superintendent come July 1. Current superintendent Jim Hickerson has been with the district since July 2007, serving as the fifth superintendent in the past 31 years in the Bering Strait School District. Hickerson has worked with BSSD for the last 26 years.

BSSD Board Chair Cliff Weyiouanna said there were 12 applicants for the job and after interviews with the board, the vote went to Rob Picou.

Picou is familiar with life off the road system. Picou has been a school principal in Barrow and other North Slope communities. He spent nine years there and said that those years were one of the best and magical years in his life. Picou said in an interview that he is looking forward to moving from his current job as principal of the Su Valley Jr./Sr. High School in Talkeetna to Unalakleet.

His wife Jodi is also a teacher and was a principal at the Talkeetna and Trapper Creek Elementary Schools for one year. Picou has experience leading five high schools in Alaska and moved to the state from New Orleans in 1997. At the Mat-Su school district, Picou has been a part of committees ranging from curriculum and dropout prevention to the committee that established district and community goals.

The spirit lives:

Spirit of the Serum Run of 1925 is alive and well

By Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

Over the years, the Iditarod sled dog race has come to be closely associated with the Diphtheria Serum Run of 1925, sometimes called the "Great Race of Mercy." For many racers, it continues to be an event run to help others. Many mushers choose to highlight health concerns, especially those that profoundly affect the people of the Norton Sound region.

In the recent past, Joe Garnie and Palmer Sagoonick raced to address the diabetes epidemic in our region. Mike Williams has used the race as a platform to promote sobriety. This year a group of mushers and supporters led by DeeDee Jonrowe used the race to raise money for the purchase and training of a service dog for Logan Erickson, a young man from Unalakleet with autism. Phil Hofstetter and others biked the trail this year to raise money for the Leukemia and Lymphoma Society.

These are just a few of the men and women who continue the tradition started in 1925 when a group of amazing people worked together to save the people of the Norton Sound Region from a terrible epidemic.

In January of 1925, a general physician with the Public Health Service, named Curtis Welch, recognized that the people of Nome were in serious trouble after several children died from what was thought to be simple tonsillitis. Children do not usu-

Saying It Sincerely

By Rev. Ross Tozzi St. Joseph Catholic Church for the Nome Ministerial Association

"This is my commandment: love one another as I love you. No one has greater love than this, to lay down one's life for one's friends" (John 15:12-13). As we prepare to enter Holy Week, we should take time daily to pause and reflect on the great love Jesus has for us.

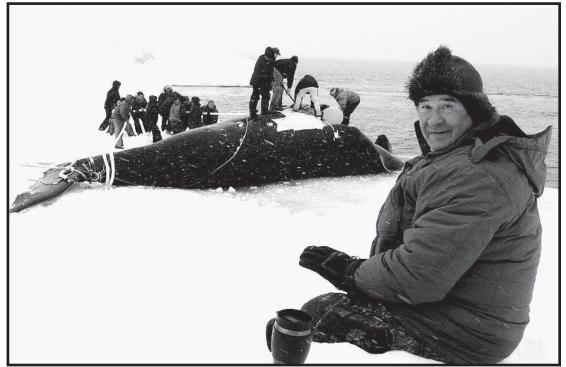

Friends share each other's joy. On Palm Sunday, Jesus rode into Jerusalem on a colt while the crowds cheered. Perhaps Palm Sunday is a little bit like an Iditarod finish. People from around the state and around the world come to cheer on the mushers and their teams in the same way that they gathered along the route of Jesus. There were shouts of joy, and proclamations of praise.

Friends recall hardships of the past. Instead of an Iditarod banquet with a thousand guests, Jesus had a smaller, more intimate meal with his closest friends a few days after he crossed into Jerusalem. Just as each Iditarod harkens back to the life saving serum run that began it all, Jesus could not help but recall the Passover of the slaves in Egypt who crossed from the Red Sea and found freedom in the desert. He also looked to the future as he blessed bread and broke it and shared it with his friends.

Friends go out of their way to help one another. One of the joys of Iditarod is seeing the countless acts of self sacrifice that are offered to make it all happen. Without that spirit of service, without many, many hands to make it all happen; the Iditarod would not be the great race that it is. During supper on Holy Thursday, Jesus took off his outer garments, tied a towel around his waist, and then washed the feet of his disciples. Jesus explained his actions, "I have given you a model to follow, so that as I have done for you, you should also do" (John 13:15).

Friends stand by one another. Even though the competitive spirit is strong, mushers also recognize a need to offer help to a fellow musher in need. Saving a life is more important than winning a race. Good Friday is the day of the Lord's Passion, a day when he calls us to offer our help in his hour of need. We are called to stand by our friend even if only in prayer. As one saint relayed, "oftentimes the realization of God's great plans depends mainly on such prayer. If we do not persevere in such prayer, we frustrate what the Lord wanted to do through us or within us. Let every soul remember these words: 'And being in anguish, He prayed longer.'"

A true friend is willing to lay down his life for us. During that first Iditarod, the goal was to save lives. On that First Good Friday, the thoughts of Jesus were about his friends. Jesus died on the cross that we might have freedom from sin and the promise of eternal life. When we unite our own suffering with the suffering of Jesus on the cross, we have an opportunity to say thank you to a dear friend who invites us to love others as he first loved us.

SHARING THE HARVEST—Whaling Captain Tommy Antoghame is shown in Gambell with the bowhead whale harvested last April.

Obituary

Tommy Antoghame

Tommy Antoghame was born in Nome on September 3, 1937. His parents were the late Jack and Jane Antoghame. He had three younger siblings: Raaspa, Anita, and Grace. Tommy met Shirley in California and got married in Oakland. Later they moved back to Alaska and had four children: Kimberly, Ryan, Leon, and Nathan. Their four children blessed them with thirteen grandchildren. He loved and cherished all his children and grandkids.

To his last days at the hospital he talked about his grandchildren to the medical staff. He was grateful to God for giving him 72 years in this life. "I thank God for my life"

He was a loving father with so much wisdom, a big heart for everyone and to the end he expressed concern for other people's pain more than his own. God blessed Tommy with a gift of hunting skills and the ability to turn parts of these animals into beautiful art. He learned from his elders, and passed on the knowledge to the youth. He taught that subsistence is our way of life. He set an example in the way he lived. He never gave up, worked hard and thanked God for everything.

He was a man of humor. We will miss him dearly.

Dear Editor,

Food packages coming into the Hudson, Colorado rent-a-prison are labeled "Product of China." The FDA does not test imported meat byproducts for species origin, and in China, rat is a legal food for humans. More likely than not, Canteen Food Service is supplying meat-byproducts to the Hudson rent-a-prison which contains wharf rat.

Chinese food processors poisoned their own children with tainted babyformula. They also poisoned American pets with tainted pet food. And should anyone think that justice is served by forcing prisoners to eat wharf rat, then consider what may be on your table. It is written that with what judgment you judge, so shall you be judged.

ally die from sore throats. Dr. Welch soon noticed that these children shared the classic symptoms of a serious infection with Corynebacterium diphtheriae, commonly known as diphtheria.

Like strep throat, diphtheria is spread easily on small droplets from a cough, sneeze, or shared utensils. But diphtheria is far deadlier than other common causes of sore throat. The diphtheria bacteria produces a toxin that destroys healthy tissue leading to the development of a membrane of necrotic tissue lining the throat, called a pseudomembrane. It was likely the recognition of this pseudomembrane that alerted Dr. Welch to the impending epidemic. Without treatment of anti-toxin, the infection can cause death in a matter of days, usually due to profound swelling of the neck, which closes off the victim's airway.

Nome's Maynard Columbia hospital, as it was called in those days, had only a few outdated doses of anti-toxin available. The region would need an estimated million units more to stave off an epidemic.

Following a desperate telegraph for help, a large quantity of anti-toxin was found at the Alaska Railroad Hospital in Anchorage and shipped by railroad from Anchorage to Nenana. At that point, the hope of Dr. Welch and the people of Norton Sound fell into the hands of 20 experienced mushers and dog teams who carried the serum by relay over 674 miles from Nenana to Nome, much of the course hampered by harsh blizzard conditions.

The anti-toxin proved lifesaving, and within a month the Nome diphtheria epidemic was contained. Dr. Welch estimated that seven people died from the disease in Nome, while many more unrecorded deaths likely occurred in the surrounding villages.

Diphtheria is no longer a major threat to the health of our region. Widespread infant immunization with the DTaP vaccine has all but eradicated the disease in developed nations.

But just as in 1925, the people of Norton Sound continue to face many serious health challenges. Just like Seppala, Ivanoff, Shannon, Anagick, Olson, Kaasen, and the other original mushers of the serum run who saw in their skill a chance to save lives, many of today's Iditarod athletes focus their hard work on improving the lives of the people here in Northwest Alaska. Their inspiration will continue to save lives long after the lantern has been extinguished.

$724,000 from the state over the last five years. Acting on a tip, Alaska Bureau of Investigation officers found out that Agtarap issued new state treasury warrants to herself under a slightly different name. These checks were then mailed to a P.O. Box in Kodiak and deposited into several accounts at two local banks. Agtarap lived in Anchorage during the week and traveled to Kodiak on the weekend. The authorities found and seized property bought with state money, which included a 2010 Nissan Armada, a 2008 Nissan Pathfinder, three four-wheelers, a Glastron boat, firearms, home electronics and furniture and other home items. Agtarap was arrested and the bail was set at $50,000.

Joseph James 48579 Hudson Correctional Facility Hudson, CO wolves were shot by Department of Fish and Game biologists. According to a report by ADF&G, the wolves matched descriptions of those seen at the site where a woman was found dead. The Alaska Department of Fish & Game announced last week that it had discontinued its search for additional wolves. The two dead wolves were sent to be studied by the state wildlife veterinarian and by microbiologists at the Alaska State Virology Laboratory. Health officials said that the wolves did not have rabies.

State veterinarian Dr. Louisa Castrodale said that animals bite people when they are sick, but also when they are startled, hungry or being protective of other animals around them. She warns that people who are bitten by an animal should promptly report the bite to a local health official. People who see animals acting abnormally should report that behavior to a local wildlife or public safety official.

Congressman seeks to cut corporate taxes

Congressman Don Young last week introduced a bill that would cut taxes of businesses by five percent if they donate to educational institutions. The bill carries the catchy name "Tax Cut Job Creation Act of 2010" and proposes to lower the corporate tax rate on earnings over $75,000 by 5 percent. In turn, a domestic business has to donate 20 percent of the savings to an approved vocational institution such as secondary schools, community colleges or vocational education courses. Young argues that the US has one of the highest corporate tax rates and that jobs and offices moved overseas where taxes are lower. Lowering the corporate tax rate would help make companies more profitable and provide meaningful incentives for businesses to fund critical job-training programs expanding the available workforce in Alaska, Young said.

Assistant principal job may be axed

Budget talks focus on Nome-Beltz position

By Tyler Rhodes

As the Nome Board of Education digs into its budget process, some members have placed the assistant principal's position at Nome-Beltz Junior/Senior High School in the crosshairs.

During its March 23 work session, the school board held its first public discourse on the proposed budget for the 2010-2011 school year. The discussion largely focused on the assistant principal position and whether it should remain or be replaced with a different job title.

The discussion came as no surprise after board member Kirsten Timbers requested at the close of the board's March 9 meeting that the position be put on the agenda as a discussion item for the coming work session. Timbers said at the March 23 work session that she wanted to examine the job description of a dean of students or another position in comparison to the assistant principal's job. She noted that the district had previously had a dean of students.

Superintendent Jon Wehde spoke to the difference between a dean and an assistant principal, noting that the dean title is generally reserved for a member of the teaching staff. A dean, he said, assists the principal but does not have the same administrative training as someone who holds what is known as Type B certification. Principals, assistant principals, superintendents and other administrators are required to hold a Type B certificate. In addition to handling disciplinary issues, the assistant prin-

NSECD turns down Nomeites' confidential proposal

By Laurie McNicholas

The board of directors of Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. decided to take no further action on a confidential proposal from the Cussy Kauer Group during a special meeting March 26 at the Westmark Hotel in Anchorage.

Nomeites Kauer, Ginny and Carl Emmons, Charlie Reader and Chuck Fagerstrom initially presented the proposal to NSEDC during a regular board meeting held Feb. 2-5 in Nome.

All discussions of the proposal at NSEDC board meetings were conducted in executive session, and spokespersons for the board and the Kauer Group have refused to state the purpose of the proposal or to make any public comments about it.

The Kauer Group first described the proposal to the NSEDC executive committee on Feb. 2 in a session from which the public and some NSEDC staff members were excluded. When the Kauer Group emerged from the session, Fagerstrom told NSEDC's Community feeds the springs.

Members of the USGS research team and representatives from the Alaska Center for Energy and Power held a public forum at Nome's Old St. Joe's Hall March 27 to give an overview of planned studies to be conducted over the next two years at the springs.

The USGS and Alaska Center for Energy and Power, a program at the University of Alaska Fairbanks, are working collaboratively on two separate studies at the springs. During its fieldwork session in late March and early April, the USGS will be collecting magnetic and gravity data from hundreds of points that cover several square miles all around the hot springs. The effort is part of the federal government's program to evaluate and assess the geothermal energy potential from sources throughout the nation. "Part of the problem in Alaska is there's all these potential resources and not a lot known about them," said Art Clark, supervisory geologist with the USGS. "If you know what you have, then you can make some intelligent decisions."

Mining area rules just fine for now

Nome Planning Commission to consider annexation of outlying areas

By Sandra L. Medearis

That no further rules, regulations nor footnotes need be added to the current resource development zoning area summarized thinking at a recent Nome Planning Commission work session.

This consensus arrived after Alaska Gold Co.'s land superintendent, Nikolai Ivanoff, put marker to map, drawing circles around outlying areas of gold-bearing dirt north and west of Nome. Ivanoff showed the planning panel where test samples tell the mining company, which controls a lion's share, to go back to work with placer mining on previously active sites or open new operations in the "back 40." Ivanoff said no new subdivisions stood out in his crystal ball. Subdivisions and other conditional uses of the resource land would call for new subsections under

It was with interest I read your editorial today. We who are interested in following the Iditarod must go to the Iditarod web to get up-to-date info. With all the television crews that you speak of pushing out the Nome people, the TV crews do not get the news to us. I think I saw 10 seconds about the start and 5 seconds about the finish.

They really don't do a good job of promoting the Iditarod. I pulled up the Nome web cam and saw one of the final mushers come in on Sat. I have to read The Nome Nugget to get the story. It is too bad that they behave like bullies when they are visitors in your town.

Mary Carlson Nebraska

Dear Editor:

There are so many volunteer hours put into so many events. When I sit back and think about some of the ones I have been involved in, I can't believe the manpower this town has when we come together. There is a quote that I like to use that says simply, "Volunteers don't necessarily have the time, but they have the heart"- Anonymous.

SPARC or Seward Peninsula Amateur Radio Club started out with a few local guys that were interested in HAM radio operations as a hobby. This club and our system have grown into one of the best life saving tools we have in our town and outlying areas. I cannot tell you the number of times in the 13 years or so that I have been a HAM radio operator that I have heard calls on the system to save lives or heard that they have happened.

When SPARC covers events like the Nome-Golovin snowmachine race, we often use our system to let the first responders know where to go. I have volunteered my services at the Start/Finish, Nome River Bridge, Farley's camp, Safety, Topkok, Timber, White Mountain, and in most recent years at race headquarters. The volunteers that I have worked with over the years can now continued on page11

Bunch of Bad Kids

After a long protracted labor, Congress finally gave birth to a Health Care Reform Bill. It was an agonizing process. Now the U.S. can join the ranks of the more progressive nations in the civilized world. But, now we have to deal with the crybabies and sore losers. They have been downright mean and ugly (not to mention stupid). We have a group of congressmen and senators who just won't do anything that might make the other guys look good. They don't want to let the good of the country and its people get in the way of politics.

The U.S. Congress is made up of the worst bunch of obstructionists in its history. Worse yet— they are destructionists. They are hell bent on destroying anything that will help the American people get health care legislation. Watch them try to kill the bill. Let's hope their efforts backfire on them. Do they really believe those screaming, rude tea bag fanatics? Where are the Eisenhower and Rockefeller Republicans? Why are they kissing up to nuts like Sarah Palin and Liz Chenev?

We need to have legislators who can work together for the good of Americans and stop putting their personal interests before the national interests. Their perception of power is so distorted that they act like bad little kids who threaten to hold their breath until they get their way. Do these "kill the bill" Republicans think people who are happy to have the security of health care will vote for them in the November mid-term election? -N.L.M.

Indian Health Care Improvement Act reauthorized

When President Obama signed the health care bill into law last week, he also signed the reauthorization of the Indian Health Care Improvement Act. This hasn't happened in 20 years. One of the changes in the bill is to elevate the job of running the Indian Health Service from an agency director to an Assistant Secretary.

Alaska Senator Lisa Murkowski has been opposed to the health care reform, but worked to update the Indian Health Care Act. Voting against the health care reform put her in the position of voting against the Indian Health Care bill she had advocated. Murkowski told APRN that she would've preferred to see it stand alone, and said she was anxious and fearful that costs associated with the bigger bill will swallow Native health care. Democrat Senator Mark Begich was pleased with the health care reform and voted for it. He said the Obama administration has improved funding for Alaska Native and Native American Health programs, but just because the Indian Health Care Act has been reauthorized doesn't guarantee its long-term funding. Both Begich and Murkowski vowed to fight for continued funding.

ciency and conservation improvements. The program is funded by the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act through the U.S. Department of Energy. Nome qualifies for more than $150,000 of the grant and so do many Norton Sound and Bering Strait villages for amounts between approximately $15,000 and $40,000. The 142 communities included in this program are boroughs and small incorporated cities that were not eligible for previous DOE block grant funding. The money can be used for energy audits and energy efficiency and conservation improvements to public facilities. AEA must receive completed applications by Tuesday, April 20, 2010.

House passes supplemental budget

On Monday, the Alaska State House unanimously passed House Bill 326, the Fiscal Year 2010 supplemental budget authorizing operating appropriations and fund transfers. The bill appropriates more than $1.6 billion, of which $1.5 billion is in fund transfers, $5.0 million for fund capitalization and $157.1 million for agency operations. The bill transfers $1.1 billion to forward-fund K-12 education for Fiscal Year 2011 and $401 million to fully repay past borrowings from the constitutional budget reserve fund. The bill authorizes $157 million in agency appropriations, including $98 million in state general funds. Fund drivers are $34.3 million for Medicaid formula growth, matched by $51.9 million in federal funds; $35.4 for fire suppression activities to pay for last summer's fire season; $10.5 million to fund the Alaska Correctional Officers Association's interest arbitration award for FY10 and FY11; $5 million to capitalize the Disaster Relief Fund; and $4.7 million for inmate health care. Funding for enhanced Alaska Marine Highway System ferry service along the Aleutian Chain is also included in this bill.

Parnell appoints Samuelson to serve on historical records advisory board

Governor Parnell appointed reappointed Laura Samuelson to the State Historical Records Advisory Board. The board is responsible for reviewing grant requests from historical, archival, research, governmental and academic organizations, and helps plan for statewide records management needs. Samuelson has been director of the city-owned Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum since 1997. She has previously worked in Nome as a state public assistance eligibility technician, construction office manager and administrative officer for the state transportation department. She also worked in public relations for Inspiration Gold, Inc., as shareholder relations director for Bering Straits Native Corp., and in various positions for the Nome Nugget newspaper. Benefits Director Paul Ivanoff that the group had made a good presentation and the executive committee's response had been positive. Ivanoff was seated among others excluded from the session, including The Nome Nugget reporter (Laurie McNicholas), who asked Fagerstrom to describe the purpose of the proposal. He said he would prefer not to do so at that time.

A week prior to the board meeting, a Nome resident told Nugget staff that local families were discussing a proposal to buy holdings of the Alaska Gold Co. with representatives of NovaGold. Alaska Gold's assets include gravel, land and placer mining operations in the Nome area. Rhylin Bailie, NovaGold's manager of corporate and investor relations, subsequently confirmed that the company had been approached by several parties including Nome residents who are interested in acquiring non-Rock Creek mine assets.

The Kauer Group presented the proposal to the full NSEDC board in an executive session on Feb. 4. The next day board members discussed the proposal in an executive session without the Kauer Group. In a public session following the closed meeting, the board adopted a motion for NSEDC to move forward with the Kauer Group's proposal. The Nugget's reporter misconstrued the action to mean the board had approved the proposal. Following the meeting, the reporter was unable to obtain any information about the proposal from Dan Harrelson, NSEDC's president and board chairman, who said the group requested confidentiality; from Kauer, who said, "It is confidential at this point," or from Fagerstrom, who did not return the reporter's phone calls.

In the Feb. 11 edition of the Nugget the reporter wrote that the NSEDC board had approved the Kauer Group's proposal. In the Feb. 18 edition, Harrelson wrote in a letter to the editor that the board had not approved any investment related to the Kauer Group in adopting a motion to move forward with the proposal at its Feb. 5 meeting.

"This essentially directed staff to look into how NSEDC might be able to work with the group, and by doing so, create jobs and foster economic development in the region," Harrelson wrote.

The Nugget reporter phoned Kauer March 28 to ask whether NSEDC had stated a reason for declining to take further action on her group's proposal and to ask if she would comment on the decision. "No; no comment," she replied.

NSEDC is a nonprofit corporation with 15 member communities in the Bering Strait region. It is one of six entities in the Western Alaska Community Development Quota Program. CDQ entities are subject to terms of the federal Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act. The MSA allows a CDQ entity to make non-fisheries related investments limited to 20 percent of its annual investments in projects located in a CDQ region.

The following excerpt from the MSA describes some requirements an entity must meet to be eligible to participate in the CDQ Program.

"(iii) OTHER INVESTMENTS— The entity may make up to 20 percent of its annual investments in any combination of the following:

"(I) For projects that are not fishery-related and that are located in its region.

"(II) On a pooled or joint investment basis with one or more other entities participating in the program for projects that are not fishery-related and that are located in one or more of their regions.

"(III) For matching Federal or State grants for projects or programs in its member villages without regard to any limitation on the Federal or State share, or restriction on the source of any non-Federal or non-State matching funds, of any grant program under any other provision of law.

"(iv) FISHERY-RELATED IN-VESTMENTS—The entity shall make the remainder percent of its annual investments in fisheries-related projects or for other purposes consistent with the practices of the entity prior to March 1, 2006.

"(v) ANNUAL STATEMENT OF COMPLIANCE—Each year the entity, following approval by its board of directors and signed by its chief executive officer, shall submit a written statement to the Secretary and the State of Alaska that summarizes the purposes for which it made investments under clauses (iii) and (iv) during the preceding year."

Board revises policies

The Rules and Bylaws Committee chaired by Don Stiles of Nome met March 25 at NSEDC's headquarters in Anchorage to discuss and recommend changes in personnel policies. The meeting began about 9:30 a.m. and ended about two hours later. Except for a few minutes of that time, the meeting was held in executive session.

On March 26 the NSEDC board approved revisions to the company's personnel policies as recommended by the rules and bylaws committee. Stiles said most of the revisions were made to comply with current laws applicable to employees. Harrelson thanked Kyan Olanna, the corporation's new general counsel, for her work in updating the policies.

The board also adopted the following change in the Board of Directors/Officers Rules, Regulations and Policies Manual:

"No member of the Board shall use or attempt to use their position to influence the hiring, retention, evaluation, or compensation of an immediate family member. For purposes of this policy, 'immediate family members' are spouses, children, parents, and siblings and the spouses of children, parents and siblings. However, members of the Board are not prohibited from participating in matters that would affect their immediate family member only indirectly or in matters pertaining to all employees of the corporation."

Upcoming meetings

Janis Ivanoff, NSEDC's chief executive officer, noted that Kawerak's regional conference is scheduled April 20-22 in Nome. She also said Kawerak's Norton Sound Fisheries Restoration and Enhancement Summit (slated May 4-6 in Nome), is funded by NSEDC. Board members may attend the events if they so desire, she added.

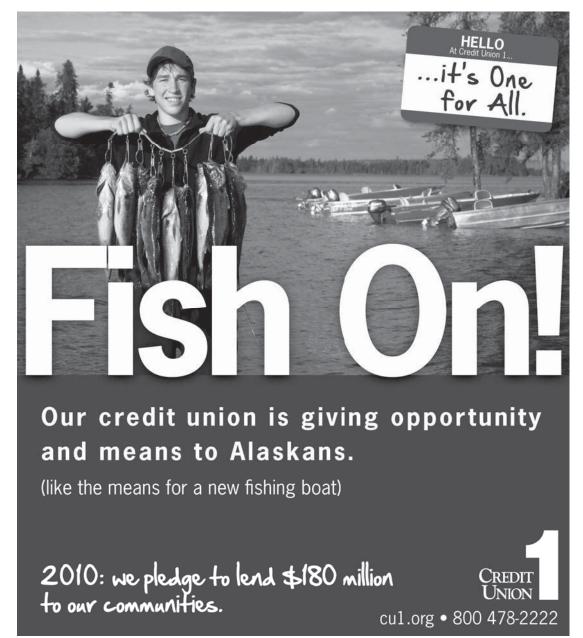

Harrelson said the next regular board meeting is scheduled in the last week of April in Unalakleet. The NSEDC board held a quarterly meeting in Unalakleet in April 2009 and a quarterly meeting and annual meetings in Unalakleet in November 2009. Frank Oxereok of Wales questioned whether spring and fall meetings of the board are to be held in Unalakleet. "Why not Nome?" he asked.

"We basically told Unalakeet we would come back," Harrelson replied. He asked for a show of hands from board members who want to meet in Nome in April. Reggie Barr of Brevig Mission, Joe Garnie of Teller, Wilfred Katcheak of Stebbins and Oxerok raised their hands. When Harrelson asked how many board members want to meet in Unalakleet in April, only Frank Katchatag of Unalakleet raised his hand. The remaining board members indicated neutrality.

Harrelson asked staff if rescheduling the meeting location on short notice will be a problem. Kathy Wheelahan, community outreach coordinator, said she had booked all available rooms at a Unalakleet facility, so NSEDC may have to pay for them unless the owner is able to fill it with other bookings. Harrelson directed staff to try to make arrangements to hold the April board meeting in Nome.

All members of the NSEDC board attended the meeting except for Truman Kava of Savoonga and Orville Ahkinga Jr. of Little Diomede, who were excused for work commitments.

cipal also performs teacher evaluations, among other duties.

Wehde said a school site is always required to have at least one Type B certificate holder on site. "It's always in a school district's interest to maintain Type B certification," he said. "Type B relates to safety. Somebody needs to be able to run the school in the principal's absence."

Board president Gloria Karmun, speaking on behalf of absent board member Albert McComas, aired her fellow board member's thoughts on the issue at the work session. She said McComas does not want the assistant principal position funded, an opinion he has shared with several people.

Board member Barb Nickels contrasted McComas' view with her support for retaining the position. "I'm just all in favor of maintaining the assistant principal so we can move forward with the curriculum and education," Nickels said.

The examination of retaining the position touches an already-raw nerve in the community over the board's handling of the Nome-Beltz administration. After a split vote in January, the board did not offer new contracts to both the current holder of the assistant principal position, Doug Boyer, and current principal Janeen Sullivan. The move spurred a rift in the community and a recall effort that will ask voters May 25 if all five board members should be retained or be booted out of office.

Several people addressed the board at the March 23 work session to request that the position be maintained. "School districts that aren't eliminating assistant principal positions aren't getting recalled," said Nomeite Matt Tomter. "Your actions continue to get stranger and stranger."

Board member Heather Payenna questioned the rationale of having more administrators at the junior high/high school complex than at the elementary school, which is only served by one principal. "What is the radical difference between the schools?" she asked.

Liz Korenek-Johnson, a teacher at the elementary school, said having only one administrator at the elementary school has been a struggle for years. "It doesn't mean that they, [Nome-Beltz], don't need one, but that we do need one [too]," Korenek-Johnson said.

Nomeite and former board member Betsy Brennan added that disciplinary issues at Nome-Beltz and the elementary school differed greatly, requiring a different level of supervision. Superintendent Wehde also remarked that a straight comparison between such a position at the elementary and junior/senior high would not be appropriate. "It's apples and oranges if we're talking about assistant principal out there [at Nome-Beltz] and assistant principal at Nome Elementary

Police say teen steals, crashes car

On March 29, at approximately 4:17 a.m., Darrinn Otton was driving along the Teller Highway near Martinsonville when he noticed a vehicle about 150 feet off the road near the cluster of houses. Its headlights were on and no one was nearby. He notified the Nome Police Department. NPD responded to the rollover.

Further investigation revealed a juvenile, age 16, had stolen the Dodge Durango. The juvenile was heading northbound on the Nome-Beltz Highway at a speed too fast for conditions when he lost control of the vehicle causing it to roll multiple times. The juvenile was not present when police arrived at the scene. However, he apparently got a ride to the hospital where he was admitted. Injuries are unknown at this time. The vehicle has an estimated damage of $10,000 or more. Police say the investigation is continuing.

School," he said. Wehde is proposing moving administrators from the district office to the elementary as well as the addition of one more administrator, a coordinator of curriculum and assessment, at the elementary school.

Others speaking at the work session noted that discipline was only one facet of the assistant principal's job. "It's not just suspending or not suspending students, as some believe," Nickels said.

To back that up, Boyer addressed the board to offer his take on the duties involved with the position he held for two years with the district. Boyer said his job encompasses testing, curriculum, attendance issues, dropout prevention, alcohol and smoking prevention efforts, tutoring, mentoring and child protection services, in addition to other areas. "There's a whole lot more to the puzzle that involves the whole community," Boyer said.

In addition to the assistant principal position, Boyer has taken on an extra-duty contract as the girls' basketball coach. The coaching job has meant Boyer has spent a number of days traveling with his team this school year. The time away from school did not go by unnoticed from board member Timbers. "It's important to point out that this vice principal has been absent for 15 of 38 instructional days," Timbers said.

In her comments to the board, teacher Korenek-Johnson said those 15 days should be looked at compared to the entire year, adding that teachers and administrators who take on the extended role as coaches and mentors should be encouraged. "I think those with extraduty contracts should be commended," she said. "I think we need teachers and administrators who show a vested interest in our community."

Nome-Beltz Principal Sullivan also addressed the board to say that eliminating the position would make for a difficult job for whoever serves as the school's next principal. "Managing the building will consume that person's time." Sullivan said.

Axing the position could also hinder the district in its search for a qualified candidate for the principal's job, Sullivan said. She listed several districts that pay principals more than Nome while offering the support of an assistant principal. She also noted that the task of implementing the district's new strategic plan will not be possible for the Nome-Beltz principal if he or she has added tasks that were previously the responsibility of the assistant principal.

The public will again have the opportunity to comment on the proposed budget, including the assistant principal position and all the other elements of the package, at a special April 6 meeting at the Nome Elementary School. The school board planned to hold the meeting at 5:30 p.m. in the commons.

Proposed limit to absences met with resistance

In addition to the assistant principal discussion, a proposal to limit the number of absences a student can have due to extracurricular activities spurred public comment at the March 23 work session.

Prompted by a letter from high school math teacher Andre van Delden, the board did not actively discuss the issue; however, a number of parents spoke up to try and head off any action that could curtail the extracurricular options for their children.

Principal Sullivan, who is also a parent of children who participate in extracurricular activities, gave a rundown of the grade point averages of students who have missed school to participate in sports or other school-sanctioned events. She said the 16 students who have missed one to five days have an average GPA of 3.1. As the number of days missed increased, the group of students who missed those days boasted higher and higher GPAs. "We hold these students accountable for grades, attendance and behavior," she said.

Boys' basketball coach and activities director Patrick Callahan also spoke in support of allowing the current policy to continue. Callahan said if students are limited to travelling for only a certain number of days, some activities will suffer. He noted that his program, basketball, would not risk losing students, but others, like music, may take a hit. "I don't know if we want to get into pigeonholing kids into different activities," he said.

Parent Robin Johnson offered the argument that keeping kids involved in after-school activities has the benefit of keeping them away from less structured options. "We don't want them wandering around the streets," she said.

While a limit could impair certain extracurricular programs, the status quo does have an effect on the classroom. When large blocks of students are all absent at once, those who remain in class are affected. "One of [van Delden's] big concerns was when he has 50 percent of his class missing, it's hard to move the entire class on," Nickels said.

It appeared, however, that there was little momentum on the board to make any changes to the current system. "It seems like our student athletes are rising up to the bar, and I don't think we need to change our policy," Nickels said.

Alaska Democratic Party office vandalized

By Diana Haecker

Sometime on Saturday night, somebody picked up a seven-pound rock and smashed it against one of the big front windows of the Alaska Democratic Party head-quarters in Anchorage. The outer windowpane broke and some of the metal frame was dented in, too. Police spokesman Lt. Dave Parker told The Nome Nugget that the police are investigating but so far there are no witnesses and no evidence other than the rock.

The damage was discovered on Sunday morning. "Without witnesses or other evidence, this case has a low solvability," Parker said.

Although there were no follow up phone calls or no note or claims to take responsibility for the act of vandalism, Democratic leaders suspect it is more than just a teenage prank.

Following the passage of the health care reform, the Anchorage office fielded many phone calls of people not agreeing with it. Patti Higgins, chairwoman of the ADP told The Nome Nugget in an interview that for the most part the people were upset about health care but were reasonable. "But then every day we also received a couple of calls where people were using obscenities to articulate their message," Higgins said.

As for the motivation to throw a rock in ADP's window, she said, "In my honest opinion, it could be at the simplest level a truck load of young people just out to smash a window. Or at an extreme level, it could be lowers and Republicans to "reload" and literally targeted 20 Democratic leaders nationwide in their reaction to the health care reform. Such militant language, Higgins thinks, ignites acts of violence. "There is a common theme among the leaders of the Tea Party and Republicans, where they call for increased violence and they need to call it off. My take on this is that those people are bullies, you face them down and tell them to knock it off," said Higgins. Higgins added that the assault on the Alaska Democratic headquarters made her really mad, but she also takes it as a sign of being on the right path. "We are winning the battle for civil rights, economic equality and justice and that's why there is such an outrage from the other side," Higgins said.

Senate Finance Committee recommends $300,000 for Marine Advisory Program

By Laurie McNicholas

The Senate Finance Committee recommended adding $300,000 for the University of Alaska's Sea Grant Marine Advisory Program to the operating budget on March 26, reports Paula Cullenberg, MAP's associate director/program leader.

The University is seeking $614,000 in state money to permanently fund MAP positions in Cordova, Dillingham, Kodiak, Nome, Petersburg and Unalaska. Heidi Herter completed a three-year commitment as Nome's MAP agent last month with funding from Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. and has left to pursue educational goals. The Nome MAP office will reopen with a new agent if state funds are provided.

Budget hearings conducted last week by the Senate Finance Committee included a statewide teleconference March 24 to take testimony on the operating and mental health budgets.

"Over the seven hours of public testimony heard by the committee, 33 people called in from 13 sites in support of the budget request for [MAP]" Cullenberg said. They included Nomeites Rose Fosdick, vice president of Kawerak's natural resources division; Charlie Lean, NSEDC's director of fisheries research and development; commercial fisherman Eric Osborne; and Doug Walrath, director, Northwestern Alaska Career and Technical Center.

Sen. Lyman Hoffman (D-Bethel) co-chairs the committee and Sen. Donny Olson (D-Nome) is a committee member. Both support the MAP budget request. Cullenberg said Hoffman announced the committee's decision to recommend $300,000 for MAP, noting that the MAP budget request received the largest support among those who testified during the March 24 teleconference

"This is a program that I think many members of this committee have received correspondence about and we are assured that this program will be implemented at its fullest level even though there is some reduction," Hoffman said.

Cullenberg said a conference committee composed of members of the House and Senate will meet to adjust differences in their operating budgets. The House did not include funds for MAP in its budget.

"I can't tell you right now how this will play out, but Senator Hoffman's comments were welcome," Cullenberg added. "I'll keep you posted on what I hear in the next week from the conference committee and from the University."

UAF wildlife program gets financial boost

University of Alaska Fairbanks' wildlife management program last week received a $650,000 donation from the estate of alumnus Calvin Lensink. The money is meant to provide support for graduate students and research focusing on wildlife management and ecology. The Lensink endowment is the largest private gift in the history of UAF's wildlife biology program. Lensink's distinguished career in Alaska included continued involvement of university graduate students in his research. He epitomized the citizenscholar, from his University of Alaska master's thesis on Alaska pine martens to his 30-year career with the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service. Lensink's doctoral dissertation remains the most important record of the history of the Alaska sea otter population. One of Lensink's many lasting contributions to Alaska was his involvement in the birth of the state's National Wildlife Refuges. His knowledge helped identify what are today 76 million acres of National Wildlife Refuges in Alaska.

Woods resigns from BoF

Governor Sean Parnell accepted the resignation of Janet Woods from the Alaska Board of Fisheries. The reasons for the resignation were not given. Woods was appointed on July 22, 2009 by former Governor Sarah Palin, and had yet to be confirmed by the Legislature. She was the only Alaska Native and Interior member on the seven-member panel that is charged with the conservation and development of Alaska's fisheries resources. Within 30 days after a vacancy occurs, the governor is to appoint a person to serve the balance of the term and submit that name to the Legislature for confirmation.

Unalakleet captures second straight ski/biathlon team title

Submitted by Keith Conger

Prior to 2008, the ski and biathlon team from Unalakleet was not among those mentioned as powerhouse teams in the Western Region. But thanks to a dynamic, Rocky Mountain toughened coach and a seasoned and determined group of junior high girls, they are one of the first names mentioned these days.

The Unalakleet squad—under the tutelage of Nancy Persons, a U.S. Ski Team-trained coach from Montana—used a double-silver performance from Aly Daniels to capture its second team title in as many years at the 32nd annual Bering Strait School District Ski and Biathlon Championships, which took place on March 25 and 26 in White Mountain.

Supporting Daniels was older sister Katie who earned a bronze medal in the 4-kilometer ski race, and Season Haugen who earned a bronze medal in the biathlon by shooting perfectly.

Haugen was one of only three of the 85 competitors at the meet to hit all 10 targets and forego the time- and energy-sapping penalty lap skiers must do for each missed shot. A fourth teammate, Jonisha Wilson, coming off a knee injury that sidelined her at the end of the 2009 season, chipped in with two fourth-place finishes.

The only skier able to keep the Unalakleet girls from sweeping the podium was Nome's Rosa Schmidt, who worked efficiently in the ski race and hit just enough shots in the biathlon to win both races. Schmidt's efforts would earn her first Ski Meister Award.

Winning times for the junior high girls ski race and the biathlon race were lower than the fastest junior high boys in each race by nearly two minutes, and one minute, respectively. According to meet historians, this was a first. Joining Schmidt in posting a faster time than their fastest male counterparts in one or more races was Unalakeet's fearless foursome—the Daniels sisters, Haugen and Wilson.

Schmidt's double-gold endeavor, along with teammate Hannah Tozier's perfect shooting and fifth-place biathlon finish, helped the Nome team secure the second place team trophy. Nome skier Lindsay Floyd was the highest placing first-year junior high girl skier, kicking in two sixth-place finishes.

White Mountain's Rayna Buck-Nassuk, who bravely battled a sore wrist, and up-and-comer Anna Prentice would trade eighth- and ninth-place finishes. The pair took the third-place trophy.

The high school boys division had its most highly competitive contest in years. The team from Nome needed a double-gold performance by Emerson Conger, and a double-bronze effort by Sam Schmidt to outlast a superb team from host White Mountain, who were anchored by double-silver medalist Asa Bergamaschi.

Vincent Tomalonis helped solidify the second-place trophy for White Mountain with two fourth-place finishes. Francis Lockwood and Jared Billingsley of Saint Michael teamed up for the third-place trophy.

In the high school girls division, Nome skier Caitlyn Tozier traded podium spots with teammate Miranda Murphy in their two races. Tozier enjoyed a three-minute margin in winning gold in the 7.5-kilometer ski race.

Murphy hit three more shots than Tozier in the biathlon race, and used the time out of the penalty loop to overcome her speedier teammate. Murphy narrowly skied away from her fellow Nome skier with a gold medal, her first as a high school biathlon racer, by a mere 14 seconds.

Since the teammates both ended up with a gold and silver medal, the time differentials proved important. Tozier used her cumulative margin to capture her second consecutive Ski Meister Award. Former standout Ski Meister Ana Swanson of Unalakleet, competing for the first time in four years, earned bronze medals in both events.

The most wide-open—and unpredictable—division was that of the junior high boys. The most pleasant surprise proved to be Corey Ningeulook, who captured Shishmaref's first ever BSSD gold medal in the biathlon. By working a third-place finish in the ski race, Ningeulook earned the region's northern-most village's first ever Ski Meister Award.

Ningeulook narrowly beat out Hank Henry, a first-year competitor from Golovin, who put in a doublesilver performance. Another remarkable performance was turned in by first-year skier Liam Floyd of Nome, who beat Henry by a razor-thin three seconds to take the gold medal in the junior high boys ski race.

Henry worked with Golovin teammate Nathaniel Piscoya to take the junior high boys team trophy. Ningeulook and David Olanna, who used nine of 10 shooting, to take fourth place in the biathlon, teamed up to earn the second place trophy for Shishmaref.

Isaac McElwee took fourth place in the ski race. He teamed up with Sigfred Brown, another nine-of-10 shooter and earner of a fifth-place in the biathlon, to bring home the third-place trophy for White Mountain.

Other notable junior high boys racers were Dominic Richardson of Saint Michael who earned his first medal, a bronze in the biathlon, and Ray Weyiouana of Shishmaref who was one of the three biathletes to hit all 10 of their targets during the race.

Standouts Nigeulook and Aly Daniels were recognized as the Most Improved Skiers. The Nome team earned the Sportsmanship Award.

Straight shooters

In order to teach shooting skills and prepare athletes for the biathlon, the BSSD Ski and Biathlon Championships has a marksmanship competition. The standout shooter in the event proved to be the eagle-eyed Maxine Kimoktoak of Koyuk, who earned a gold medal in the junior high girls division by hitting an unimaginable 50 consecutive targets.

Other age category gold medal marksmen were Bergamaschi in the high school boys division, Murphy in the high school girls division, and Ned Ahgupuk of Shishmaref in the junior high boys division.

The sport of biathlon is unique in that it combines the fast-paced sport of cross-country skiing, with the slow-paced sport of target shooting. In White Mountain, all athletes ski around the 1.7-mile course twice. At the midpoint of each lap, the skier enters a shooting range where they find a 22-caliber biathlon rifle, each with a range safety officer, waiting for them.

During each shooting bout of the biathlon race at the BSSD Championships, competitors take five shots in the prone position at 4.5-inch targets, which are placed 50 meters down range.

Every errant shot results in the skier having to enter the penalty loop area and perform one lap for each miss. Depending on the athlete, penalty laps can add anywhere from 15 to 45 seconds to the racer's total time.

With 85 competitors from 13 different sites around the region, this year's biathlon at the BSSD Ski and Biathlon Championships is one of largest, if not the largest, biathlon event in the United States of America this year.

Both the BSSD and Nome teams use the BSSD Ski and Biathlon Championships as a qualifier for the state rural schools ski and biathlon championships, which are run by the Western Interior Ski/Biathlon Association (WISA). This year's WISA Ski and Biathlon Championships will be held in Tanana on April 1-3.

John Miles and Eric Morris established the BSSD Ski and Biathlon Championships. The pair has been helping to run the annual event since 1978. Miles and Morris were joined at the 2010 event by longtime race coordinator Rudy Howard.

The trio, with more than 90 years of ski event experience, is retiring after this year. The coordination of future events has been turned over to Irving Ashenfelter and Paul Lincoln, both of White Mountain.

We can all play a part in strengthening families

April is National Child Abuse Prevention Month

his month and throughout the year, Kawerak, Inc. Child Advocacy Center encourages all individuals and organizations to play a role in making the Bering Strait Region a better place for families. By ensuring that parents have the knowledge, skills, and resources they need to care for their children, we can help prevent child abuse and neglect by strengthening families and communities. Research shows that five important factors are present in healthy families. Promoting these factors is among the most effective ways to reduce the risk of child abuse and neglect. They are:

- Nurturing and attachment
- Knowledge of parenting and of child and youth development
- Parental resilience
- Social connections
- Concrete supports for parents

pril is a time to celebrate the important role that communities play in protecting children. Everyone's participation is critical. Focusing on ways to promote the five protective factors, in every interaction with families, is the best thing our community can do to strengthen families and prevent child abuse and neglect.

Open house

Kawerak, Inc. Child Advocacy Center invites the community to an open house on April 21, 2010 from 4:00 p.m. to 5:00 p.m. at the Child Advocacy Center located at 407 K Street, Nome, Alaska. Meet the staff of the CAC and members of the Multidisciplinary Team (MDT) for the Bering Strait Region. The MDT is a group of professionals working to help child victims of abuse. Members include Alaska State Troopers, Nome Police Department, Norton Sound Social Services, Norton Sound Behavioral Health, Sexual Assault Response Team, Office of Children Services, Department of Juvenile Justice, Bering Sea Women's Group, District Attorney's Office, and the Child Advocacy Center.

East meets west: Diomede's on the move

By Jesse Faulen

The distance between Big and Little Diomede islands is getting smaller. Thanks to tectonic plate movement, Russia's Big Diomede, an island in the middle of the Bering Strait is slipping to the east and will soon come in contact with the U.S. island of Little Diomede. They are about three miles apart with the International Date Line between them.

Scandinavian physical geologist Loof Lirpa describes the event as being like two gigantic congealed Swedish Meatballs sliding on a tilted dinner plate. He predicts contact will occur sometime April 1 on both sides of the Dateline.

The situation where east meets west is likely to cause concern when the new island proclaims itself half American and half Russian. Local residents claim it will make it easier for Sarah Palin to see Russia.

Alaskan politicans say they wouldn't mind some federal earmarks and pork funding to build a bridge from Wales to Diomede. It would be known as the bridge to Somewhere Else. Plans are underway for Stimulus Funds to man the toll booth.

Weight loss is about physical activity and nutrition

Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

Many people are surprised to discover that exercise alone, even strenexercise, does automatically lead to weight loss. To make matters worse, a new study suggests that exercise itself may not prevent weight gain either.

The study, published last week in the Journal of the American Medical Association (JAMA) followed 34,079 women over 15 years and compared weight gain in three different groups. The first group participated in moderate-intensity exercise fewer than 30 minutes per day. The second group exercised for at least 150 minutes per week (the amount recommended by the American Heart Association). A third group exercised for at least one hour every day of the week.

Surprisingly, all of the groups gained roughly the same amount of weight over time. The only exception was a subgroup of women who started with, and were able to maintain, a healthy body mass index (BMI) of under 25 by exercising at least 60 minutes daily.

The study highlights two very important points. First, moderate-intensity exercise, while great for preventing cardiovascular disease, diabetes, and depression, does not by itself prevent weight gain in those who are already overweight. Second, it takes a significant amount of moderate-intensity exercise (60 minutes daily in this study) to prevent gaining weight in those with a nor-

These findings may frustrate those who include exercise in an overall weight loss program. But there is another important point hidden within the details of the study. The participants in this study ate a "usual diet." In other words, their diet was not restricted, and they naturally took in extra calories to replace those expended during exercise. The human body is hormonally wired to crave a little more food than what is required for daily activity. Historically this protects us during times of food shortage, but in modern times in over-nourished developed countries like the U.S., this incremental intake of excess food results in an obesity epidemic.

Simply put, weight gain results from an imbalance between energy intake and expenditure. If a person consumes more calories than those burned during exercise, it does not matter if he or she exercises only a few minutes or for over an hour, the result will be weight gain. To lose weight, or prevent weight gain, a person must take in fewer calories than are burned.

The solution, therefore, is a combination of calorie management and physical activity. An average person burns 100 calories by walking one mile. Instead of replacing those calories with a 100-calorie sports drink (16 oz.), a person may choose

Sound Off: Breakers gets set for Iditarod fun

By Cussy Kauer

As Mitch Seavey's young son with an extraordinary talent belted out "We are the Champions" at the Musher's banquet, I could not help but reflect back on the week, and revel in my own pride at the work of our own champions at the Breakers Bar. Iditarod XXXVIII was a champion's challenge! And, congratulations to you, Lance Mackey, on your fourth consecutive win Lance and Wattie and Sonny and the rest prepared to take off in the ceremonial start on 4th Avenue in Anchorage, the Breakers Bar prepared for their arrival on Front Street in

Randy Oles checked all extinguishers, hand rails were tightened, stairways checked, and Mike Winkleman spent two days on the floor re-sealing seams in our linoleum as our building heaved another sigh, as if shifting to a more comfortable position knowing the weight it would bear during its 38th Iditarod. David O'Connor and I hauled stock at 27 degrees below zero, while race contenders carefully traversed in the same, or worse, weather on the trail. Son Dawson helped haul cases and cases of juice, party supplies, garbage supplies and cleaning supplies as we prepared to get the little things out of the way.

Monday evening our Iditarod week began as George Halas of K & L Distributors hosted our kick off party with gifts he shared from sponsors Alaskan Amber and Jack Daniels. Tuesday our pace was picking up with the expected arrival of front runners Mackey, Gatt and King. Miss Melissa manned the Blue Crown station, with our two others also at the ready. Son Jade helped pack stock, keeping the coolers full and ice in our wells. Horray! Horray for the Champions, as Nome gave them a Nome Welcome! I noticed in the early hours Wednesday morning at closing, our workhorse ice machine was not keeping up with the demand, and back to check at 9 a.m., I knew we were in trouble.

A call to Mike Winkleman, and a refrigeration technician in Anchorage, their ensuing conversations and over the phone testing confirmed my worst fears - our ice machine was kaput. Time was now of the essence, as #153 leaves Anchorage by 4 p.m., and we were desperate for a working machine. In the meantime, bless Joan Finke and her staff at Nome Liquor as they began sacking up our first load of 36 bags of ice to get us through the day. The refrigeration company came through and had the correct part. Thanks to Ron Mc-Cormick with Alaska Airlines and his watchful eye as our ice machine made its way through Anchorage and was delivered and loaded on his last airplane of the day.

Greg Hauschild and Vern Reddington earlier in the day helped set our arm wrestling table to perfection. Our arm wrestling contest was again MC'd by Monica Rose, with the help of her husband Joel, and Kevin Albert, Odom Corporation representative. Winkleman and Dave Ramos carefully hauled in our new machine and began frantically hooking it up; wrestlers and visitors were none the wiser. Soon trophies from Odom with prize assistance from Don Hansen, Northland Services, were presented to these first place finishers in their categories of heavy weight, middle weight, and light weight respectively: Kevin Bodhi, Bob Brown, Dale Ellanna, Monica Rose, Maggie Stang and Stacey

Joan called at 10 p.m, to see how we were doing, as she had her staff make up more bags of ice to get us through the night. We had to have an answer for her soon, as she closed at midnight. I almost cried when at 11:30 p.m. the first chunks of ice fell out of our new machine. Running on three hours of sleep the past 48 hours, I fell into my bed.

Thursday evening Benny, Ian, Krysta, Devola, guest Nikki, all led by Miss Kelly, wowed us to "Wipe Out" with their hula performance. Bufford Sallaffie ran the foosball tourney in the background, thanks to prizes and contributions from Stargate Alaska, Ron Jones, Quality Auto Parts, and Breakers. We recognize single and doubles finishers in order of first, second and third, respectively: Roger Thompson, Nikki Pomrenke, Sye Larson, Roger Thompson, Ken Hughes/Ron Jones, and Peggy Darling/Bob Madden Jr.

Friday afternoon several ladies just arrived and from out of town. noticed at their host Bering Sea band-b some colorful leis, and inquiring, learned they had been part of our fun the night before. These ladies decided the winner's team would not be the only team to have a garland of flowers around the necks of the leaders, and were pleased as punch to replace on their favorite musher's lead dogs. Imagine that!

Early Friday evening found George and Mrs. Halas "rootin' for Newton", waving our own Jamaicar flag, and the evening brightened as masked sheriffs, cowboys and cowgirls donned neon necklaces and bracelets, hats and bandanas, as the last mushers on the trail did the 'giddy up and go" for Nome.

Daughter Rajene came to experience Iditarod and help me prepare the Lions Clubs corned beef and cabbage meal which was enjoyed by 80 golfers, as reported by Kerry Webster, organizer. Ian, Benny and Jackie Cabrera helped haul cookers dowr and meat up at 5 in the morning to get that meal started, in order to be ready for hungry golfers. My girlfriend and classmate Iris Foster Magnell made this her first Iditarod and in her exquisite traditional parka, the sound of cameras clicking followed her at every move. Did you see the beautiful berry pickers Bessie Herman Meyer, another friend and classmate, brought to the craft fair? Stained with the juice of blueberries and painted by her self-taught artis daughter Jozeca, or Jozi, some o these stunning works of art are now mine, and will probably never see a berry patch.

Yes, this Iditarod was a challenge between the ice maker and a couple other mechanical malfunctions We've got a staff who I am sure rar as many, or more, miles behind the plank as any musher did behind his team. For throbbing, swollen ankles and feet, I have no medicine to massage. To quickly remember each and every customer request and to serve with composure, a calm disposition and a smile on one's face, takes stamina and resilience. A tempered Team Breakers was on the move facing ever changing shift demands and with every challenge thrown a us, we pulled together through Iditarod 38. I can attest, and as the saying goes, when the going gets tough the tough get going.

To each and every Nomeite who stood along side us, we couldn't have done it alone. It is with sincers thanks to you, and our local patrons who continue to support us every day, and to those new who shared our Iditarod experience, we are glad you were here. Dedicated to serving you, we look forward to a spectacular summer at the Breakers, in Nome A week ago Seavey's son from the bottom of his heart sang... the Champions...my friend...", bu know that those who stepped in to help us, and particularly these Breakers guys and gals, they ARE the Champions, my friends....Ian Alvanna-Stimpfle, Kelly Blevins, Tony Burdick, Jennifer Ford, Melissa Ford, Krysta Kauer, Cherie Liston Devola Michels, Jackie Olanna Benny Piscoya, and David O'Con-

Foster's Report

By Rep. Neal Foster

Waiting for Senate Capital Budget

It might be two weeks more before a Senate Finance Committee Substitute will be acted upon. It gives the House Finance Committee very little time to add or delete items that are priorities for the House of Representatives. (The Capital Budget is important because that is where community projects are funded.)

The Senate just passed the Operating Budget out of the Senate Finance Committee Monday morning. We still haven't had time to compare their version with that passed by the House of Representatives on March 11. The bill still has to pass the Senate floor and be returned to the House for concurrence. If the House doesn't concur (and it won't) those items that differ in the House and Senate versions of the bill will go to free conference committee where they will be resolved.

Transporting Oxygen

The FAA restriction on air transportation of medical oxygen bottles has been addressed with the attachment of an amendment which excludes Alaska in the FAA Reauthorization bill that passed the U.S. Senate last Friday. Senate changes must still be approved by the House of Representatives. Our office will continue to monitor this issue since there is no other way to get oxygen bottles to outlying communities in the district.

Grant Applications

Alaska Energy Authority announced the opening of the application period for its Alaska Small Cities Energy Efficiency and Conservation Block Grants program. For this program, AEA developed a funding formula that established a base of $10,000 per eligible community plus additional funding based on population. These grants can be used for energy audits and energy efficiency and conservation improvements to public facilities. AEA will provide technical assistance to communities needing help in identifying and implementing these improvements. Eligible communities who would like to promote energy efficiency and conservation are encouraged to apply.

Grant application documents, application instructions, a complete list of communities eligible for the Alaska Small Cities Block Grants and other contact information can be found at www.akenergyauthority.org/eecbg.html. Applicants may also contact Energy Efficiency and Conservation Project Manager Sean Skaling by e-mail at sskaling@aidea.org, or telephone (907) 771-3079.

Visitors to the Office

Two students who attended Alaska Youth for Environmental Action visited the office. They are Beverly Nakarak from Elim and Fabian Pete from Stebbins.

cover the race with their eyes closed almost. All SPARC members who volunteer for this event, and others like it should be proud that their skills are needed, warranted and wanted. Folks who are not a HAM, or do not have one in their household, please consider taking the test to become a licensed HAM. You will eventually help save the lives of the people camping with you, living near you or help your friends along the road system (and beyond) who need a hand. The largest of thanks goes to the men and women who spend countless hours building, upgrading and maintaining our mountain top repeater system. We would not be the club we are if it were not for the efforts of those that started the club or the people that keep it up and running!

Some of the other groups that rely solely on volunteers that I'd like to recognize include the Nome Volunteer Fire Department and the Nome Volunteer Ambulance Service. Just the word VOLUNTEER in their official titles tells you enough. It's sometimes a thankless job and the hours for training and call outs are long. There is the American Legion and VFW and their auxiliaries, the Lions Club, the Rotary, those that volunteer for the City of Nome Spring clean up, airlines that donate freight to families in need, those that helped Jacob for his Christmas event, those that volunteer to cook for potlucks, Iditarod volunteers, the people that run the recycling program, those who raise money for cancer groups... There are so many volunteers.

When you see someone volunteering for the greater good, take the time to recognize them and get involved yourself! Teach our children the value of volunteerism. This little town could not do what we do without our volunteers. Lend your talents to whatever cause you can and don't look back. You will need a volunteer along the way. Thank you Dear Editor

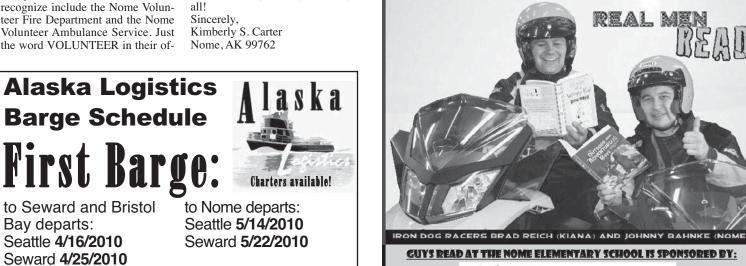

It wouldn't take much to damage the healthy environment of Bristol Bay; just 2 parts per billon concentrations of copper above ground may damage the salmon spawning grounds.

After the gold, copper and other metals has been crushed and washed with chemicals, almost all of or 99% will be left behind forever. Pebble waste will be a potential source of chemical pollution for many years.

Tailings are vulnerable to erosions, landsides, earthquakes and will collect into our head waters of Bristol Bay.

Pebble Mine will be the largest tragedy of a human made hazard that negatively affects Bristol Bay's environment.

Obituary

Vivien Kayonick (Oxereok) Olin

Vivien Kayonick (Oxereok) Olin left to be with our Lord and Savior on March 19, with all of her children by her side. She was born in Wales,

Vivien Kayonick (Oxereok) Olin

AK to Charles and Agnes Oxereok on August 4, 1940. At age 18 she relocated to California through the Bureau of Indian Affairs work program. She met her husband James L. Olin in southern California and moved to Washington State. She later returned to Alaska with her five beautiful children. She lived in Nome for a short time before moving back to Wales. There she started a 26-year career as a Special Education aide. In her work, her love resonated through her students. She took many college courses through distance education to enhance her skills. Although she retired, her time was spent around the children she cared about the most — her grandchildren and great-grandchildren. She assured their needs were met and always tried to fulfill their wants as well, not missing a single birthday. Grammy was happiest when she was with them. She loved to pick berries and greens, go clamming, camp with relatives, sew, bead, crochet, bake, and help others. One of her special moments was when she was singing in the choir and at church. She was known for her delicious cinnamon rolls and donuts. One of her last contributions to the Community of Wales was making ugilhaaqs for the 10th annual Kingimiut Dance Festival.

Vivien was a very caring person and a pillar in her community. Her faith in God was strong and she enjoyed going to church and conferences. She was a member of Wales Lutheran Church most of her life and Alaska Native Lutheran Church while she lived in Anchorage. She served on the IRA, City and Church councils in Wales. She was known as Mom, Ma, Momma, Grammy, Gram, Way Far Gram, Vi and Auntie Vi. She was a daddy's girl and missed him terribly after he passed away when she was 8 years old. She spoke fond memories of her favorite brother Fred, often making folks laugh.

Vivien is survived by all five of her children; Michele Ongtowasruk and husband Clyde Sr., Charles Olin, Sandra Keller and husband Lester, Denise Olin and Geraldine Ongtowasruk and husband Ron; sister Mary Alexander and brother Isaac Oxereok; sister-in-law Betty Oxereok; grandchildren Clyde Jr., Dave Sr., Clarence, Lisa, Jessie Ongtowasruk and Nikolai Leahy, Heather and Brandon Ongtowasruk, Rebecca Olin, Lori, Hattie and Joshua Keller, Jessica Olin, Woodrow Kitchen, Danielle Ozenna, David and Josalyn Olin, James, Tamara, Cheryl, Amber, Shannon and Tiffany Ongtowasruk; greatgrandchildren Tyrone Olin, Angeli-Titus, Caleb Okpealuk, Creedence and Dave Jr. Ongtowas-Kayden and Jeffery Komonaseak, Kailey Ongtowasruk, Owen Smith, Patrick and Kevin Ongtowasruk. She is also survived by many cousins, nieces and nephews who loved her dearly.

She was preceded in death by her parents Charles and Agnes Oxereok; brothers Frank Sr., Ernest, Daniel, David, Charles Jr., Sherman, Frederick, and 1st Isaac Oxereok; sisters

Naomi Attatayuk and Jane Oxereok; husband James Leroy Olin; brothersin-law Roland Alexander and Joseph Attatayuk; sister-in-law Evelyn Oxereok; grandchildren 1st Amber Michelle Ongtowasruk and Preston Robin Keller; just recently her beloved great-nieces Kimberly Rachel Oxereok and Iris Ann Johnson.

"He is risen!"

{ Text: Luke 24:1-12 }

"Why do you look for the living among the dead?"

It was a beautiful morning; however, sadness and even fear had invaded the hearts of those who had followed him to the top of the mountain outside of the city. There, they watched as the soldiers laid him down on a wooden cross and proceeded to drive the nails into his outstretched hands and feet. They watched as the soldiers lifted the cross, bearing the full weight of his mutilated body, and then suddenly released it, allowing it to fall heavily into the hole which would hold it upright for all to see clearly he who had been crucified. They looked upon the barely recognizable figure of the Messiah, Jesus Christ, the Son of God. Many in the crowd stood in silence as Jesus hung on the cross that day. And yet, others cursed at him and reviled him as though he were guilty of the charges he had been acquitted of by Pilate. And still, there were those who had believed in his teachings and had followed him throughout the countryside and into the towns. However, now they stood in the crowd on that mountaintop, the place called Calvary, and watched as Jesus died on that cross.

After he had died, his body was taken down and placed in a tomb. A stone was rolled in front of the entrance and guards were placed there to prevent someone from stealing his body. Jesus had said that he would be killed, but that he would rise from the dead after three days (Matthew 16:21).

So, here we are; it was a beautiful morning, and a few of the women who had followed Jesus faithfully, now made their way to the tomb. As they approached, they saw two men in "clothing that gleamed like lightning," standing next to them. The women, struck with fear, bowed down before the two men. The men looked at them and asked: "Why do you look for the living among the dead? He is not here. He has risen!"

Can you imagine the shock, and yet the joy that raced through their hearts at these words? There Lord, their Messiah, Jesus wasn't in the tomb. He had risen! He was alive! The women got up and ran to tell his disciples what had just happened. When they got there, they shared everything that had taken place. But the disciples thought they may have been overcome by their grief, so Peter got up and "ran to the tomb," and found their words to be true.

My friend, Jesus has risen! Today "He lives!" He reigns at the right hand of the father at this very moment. He intervenes on your and my behalf every moment of the day. As you celebrate Easter this Sunday, please remember, it's not about cute little bunnies and colored eggs and candies. It's all about who died for your and my sin and who came forth from that tomb on that first Easter morning to secure for us, eternal life with him. Easter is all about the resurrection of our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ the Son of the Living God! My friend, Jesus is alive, and he loves you! May you have a blessed Easter this Sunday as you worship the Risen Savior!

Blessings and Happy Easter!

to hydrate with water (zero calories), leading to a net loss of weight. It turns out healthy weight management comes down to making this type of daily choice about physical activity and nutrition.

While the most sustainable weight loss plans include some form of calorie restriction, the reduction in daily calories does not need to be excessive. Many people find it helpful to log their intake of calories for two weeks and then find ways to lower their daily intake of excess calories by about 10 percent. For some people this can be as easy as dropping one sugary beverage per day. More important, increasing the percentage of calories from fruits, vegetables, nuts, and fish in the diet helps with weight management and overall health

Exercise has many beneficial effects. It would be wrong to give up exercise simply because it does not directly promote weight loss. Consistent daily exercise lowers blood pressure, protects against heart disease, prevents the development of diabetes, and improves brain function.

The new study published in JAMA reinforces the point that exercise alone does not lead to weight loss. Maintaining a healthy weight results from daily healthy choices regarding both physical activity and nutrition.

The USGS teams travelled to the springs March 29 with plans to spend two weeks measuring minute variations in the gravitational and magnetic fields for much of the basin between the Kigluaik Mountains and the Hen and Chickens formation. The research will involve towing equipment by snowmachine where the terrain allows, and by human power where vegetation limits snowmachine travel.

The UAF project will study whether aerial infrared photography can be used as a viable, low-cost method of evaluating the energy potential of geothermal features. UAF professor Anupma Prakash has used the technology to conduct surveys of underground coal mine fires around the world. Using special cameras, Prakash has been able to evaluate the temperature and scale of the underground fires, aiding in developing appropriate response to fight the blazes.

The $4.6 million UAF study aims to prove that by using the forwardlooking infrared cameras, decisions on whether to drill wells to further evaluate geothermal resources can be made with more certainty of what is to be found. While the UAF study is built around testing the new assessment method, the region stands to benefit by having Pilgrim be the guinea pig. The 2 1/2-year study calls for drilling additional wells at the site to prove whether the aerial method is accurate or not. The additional data could help determine whether power production at the site is feasible.

Both research programs could aid in detecting just where the hot water at Pilgrim is coming from. "There is the potential that the resource source and the source where you see the hot springs really aren't that close," said Gwen Holdman, director of the Alaska Center for Energy and Power.

This is not the first time that hot water detectives have labored to find Pilgrim's hot spot. Holdman said initial studies were conducted from 1979 to 1982 by the University of Alaska. A half dozen wells were drilled in the area that were anywhere from 150 feet to 1,000 feet deep. The wells, all drilled relatively close to each other, encountered water up to 200 degrees in temperature. Most of the hot water was found close to the surface. At the time, Holdman said, the water temperature was not high enough to support an economically viable energy project.

Rising energy costs, the advent of new technology and a push to develop more alternative energy projects are conspiring to make Pilgrim more attractive as an energy option. Holdman was the project engineer for the geothermal power project conducted at Chena Hot Springs near Fairbanks. Using water that is only 165°F—the temperature of a good, hot cup of coffee, she said—Chena was able to develop the lowest-temperature geothermal power project in the world.

Looking at the rough and scant data from Pilgrim, Holdman tentatively said the hot springs 70 miles from Nome could perhaps produce twice the power of Chena. The downside of Pilgrim, however, is its distance from population centers. Any savings that may come from generating power from steam could well be eaten up by the costs of building transmission lines to Nome or surrounding villages.

The UAF project is basing its funding on a federal Department of Energy Grant that requires matching funds. Holdman said the Alaska Center for Energy and Power is looking to the state's Renewable Energy Fund for the match.

Holdman said aerial survey work is planned for this summer as well as repair and assessment work from the existing wells at the site. She said some ground-based assessment work will be conducted this summer. Data gathered this summer will be used for conceptual modeling and an economic analysis to be done over next winter.

Holdman said well drilling is planned for the summer of 2011 with two to four wells drilled approximately 500 feet deep and two more drilled to 2,500 feet to confirm the findings. A modeling of the reservoir is planned for the winter of 2011.

The researchers stressed that their work purely revolves around assessment and is not geared toward developing the resource.

resource zone regs, some of which would put some restrictions to mining activity. No conditional uses could occur without adding to the current resource development zone rules.

The resource development area is basically Nome's backyard, including west of the city limits, Alaska Army National Guard Area, between Dredge 5 on the east and Icyview, Dry Creek, behind the state prison, to name some places on Ivanoff's map. Some of the sites, closed when finances and low prices for gold stressed the company, still have placer mining potential with modern technology available, Ivanoff explained.

"It doesn't seem that we need to address resource areas right now?' planning commission president Tom Sparks said.

Nope, Ivanoff agreed. A group has approached Alaska Gold to buy the land for gravel and placer mining, "but that would still be resource development," Ivanoff commented. "The map is very good. You can't make everyone happy, but it is good."

Commissioner Jerald Brown left the door open to other uses. "Let's let developers come and propose their ideas. Then we can look at zoning," he said.

That took one big job off the commission's workbench for now and left a couple more tasks to work on with contracted professional planner Eileen Bechtol: first, revising the comprehensive plan and next, with help from the public, exploring the benefits, if any, of annexing inhabited and developed areas of the countryside into Nome's city limits.

The commission and Nome Common Council adopted Phase I of the Nome Comprehensive Plan in 2003 after months of work and community input sessions. Phase II will include a land use plan, maps and an implementation plan. At the work session, the group sifted through future objectives in Phase I. These included plans to revitalize Front Street and enforce solutions to derelict buildings that are unsightly, unsafe, unsecured and therefore public nuisances. The commission, in revising the plan, will knock some of the objectives off the list, but the public will have input concerning the plan before it is final.

The "A" word

Annexation—the commission was treading softly on that subject, although it does come up from time to time, both as a benefit to those living outside the city and as a benefit to the city in collecting money for taxes. Or on the other side of the coin, as a burden to both new city tax payers and to the city as provider of costly services in outlying areas.

Commissioners stressed in the March 23 work session that the discussion on annexation is highly preliminary.

Some of the reasons cities decide to annex are to remedy inequities faced by city taxpayers, reduce the city's exposure to liabilities, provide services such as fire protection or police protection outside their corporate boundaries and to promote orderly growth and development, or to remove threats to public health and safety, Bechtol told the panel.

State law allows for several means of annexation to cities. The most commonly used method in Alaska is through review and approval by Legislature.

"People tell me they want to be in the city limits, so they can vote, so they can belong," Brown said. "I used to think there was no reason [to annex]."

Commissioners wondered how additional costs extending services would stack up with more people paying for them.

Commissioner Jeff Darling suggested a study to see if annexation would, by spreading the costs over a greater number, lower the cost of services. Conversation mentioned Tripple Creek, Rock Creek Mine, Cape Nome and other outlying areas, in the same breath with annexation.

"I think it is time to have a conversation with the community," Sparks said.

Annexation would have to comply with rules of the state Boundary Commission.

Discussion of the above topics will continue at the NPC regular meeting April 6.

Biscotti placed on leave after district requests investigation into credentials

By Tyler Rhodes

The principal of Nome Elementary School has been placed on leave while a state commission investigates her teaching credentials. Jon Berkeley, an administrator with the district, will serve as acting principal while Shari Biscotti is on paid administrative leave.

"She is placed on administrative leave pursuant to a professional teaching practice complaint that the district filed with the state on April 1," Nome Public Schools Superintendent Jon Wehde said Tuesday. Wehde said the complaint was filed after information was provided to his office regarding Biscotti's credentials in California, the state in which Biscotti spent all or nearly all of her career before coming to Nome.

Records from California Commission on Teacher Credentialing show that Biscotti's credentials in that state were revoked in August 2009, four months after she had already been

Council approves city's agreement with volunteer vet

By Laurie McNicholas

Veterinarian Christina Kilby will administer vaccinations and medications to animals for the City of Nome on a volunteer basis under an agreement with the city approved by the Nome Common Council at a special meeting March 30. The agreement extends from March 31, 2010 through March 31, 2011 unless terminated by either party

Kilby, who is employed by Norton Sound Health Corp., volunteered to provide the services because the city lacks an operating veterinary clinic. In addition to administering vaccinations and anti-parasitic medications, she will euthanize suffering or unadoptable animals, provide limited treatment to injured animals living within and around the Nome area and establish and maintain medical records and a controlled substances log per Alaska statutes and veterinary practice regulations.

Kilby commented in a subsequent conversation with The Nome Nugget that her limited services will be conducted solely through the city and that she has no plans to open a private veterinary practice. She also noted that any concerns or questions regarding animal care need to be made through the city's animal shelter and not directly to her at work at Norton Sound Health Corp.

Kilby also is committed to working with the city's animal control officer to establish a list of charges for services provided to the public to cover the costs incurred by the city for equipment, medications and supplies. The agreement stipulates that the city will reimburse Kilby for such costs.

Councilman Stan Andersen asked City Manager Josie Bahnke whether Kilby will use the city's animal control facility to provide veterinary services, and he questioned whether the facility has running water. Bahnke assured him the facility has running water and that Kilby is working with the animal control officer to use it.

Andersen also asked Bahnke to clarify a statement in the agreement that reads: "Contractor may, but does not currently intend to, use City's animal control facility for purposes of providing veterinary care to animals for Contractor's own profit." Bahnke said Kilby intends to use the facility only as a volunteer and not for business. Noting that city ordinances require an owner of pets (dogs, cats and horses) to obtain an anmual license from the city clerk and to provide proof the pets have been properly immunized, Councilman Jerald Brown asked whether Kilby will provide such immunizations under the agreement with the city. Bahnke said Kilby will work with the animal control officer on an annual immunization clinic, but the agreement with the city does not include other immunization services for privately owned pets.

Prior to approving the agreement, the council adopted a motion to amend it by deleting the following sentence from the section on reimbursement of expenses: "City shall reimburse Volunteer for the cost [of] the insurance policy required by paragraph 4(e)(1) of this Agreement." Larson noted the agreement does not include paragraph 4(e)(1).

Veterinary services were formerly provided to the city by Dr. Derek Leedy, who is currently appealing the suspension of his li-

The council unanimously approved a lution authorizing Mayor Denise Michels to enter into an agreement for the Nome Elementary School Boilers Replacement Project estimated to cost $534,367. Prior to the vote, Nome Public Schools Superintendent Jon Wehde told council members that NPS has set aside $500,000 for the project, the total cost of which is capped at $600,000. He asked the city to provide additional funds required to complete the project.

Unalakleet dad faces sentence in daughter's death

By Sandra L. Medearis

In an apparent plea agreement, the court has set June 4 for sentencing in the case of a dad convicted of manslaughter in the death of his 11month-old daughter who was starved for some months and then injured when her mother threw her to the floor.

The mom, Heather Takak, had been Johnson's longtime partner. The couple had a son born in 2001.

A Unalakleet jury found Frank R. Johnson guilty of not protecting the infant, Christina Johnson, from harm. According to testimony in the case, before she assaulted the baby, Takak starved Christina to the point where the infant had essentially no fat left in her body. Her muscles had atrophied. One witness testified that Christina looked like a famine victim at the time of her death.

The case has been in the courts since 2004 when a grand jury indicted Johnson and Takak on differing charges of murder in the baby's death at Unalakleet Clinic in November 2004.

Takak, following a plea agreement, is serving a prison sentence. A Unalakleet jury found Johnson guilty of a reduced charge of manslaughter and ruled that the babe had died from head injuries incurred when her mother admittedly threw her to the floor in Johnson's absence. However, the jury also returned a special verdict form showing unanimous agreement that the cause of the child's death was the head injury, not starvation or a combination of injury and starvation. Johnson argued that the

Dear Editor.

We were so excited to be able to go to the Nome Arts Council, One Voice. It was soo incredible. We felt like we were at an elegant event in some big city. Everyone was so dressed up. The four very talented, beautiful ladies who performed had such amazing stage presence, and the level of professional talent was amazing. The muscians that accompanied them were so impressive. The absolutely lovely evening went way to fast. The decorations, food, lightning, waiters and attire was so perfect for the event. We know so much work went into this concert, we just wanted to thank every volunteer and the person or persons who envisioned it and made it happen. We can only imagine the many hours of rehearsing that went into this excellent performance. It was a powerful message delivered so elegantly and proceeds donated to such a great cause. We just hope it can happen again. We would go again and again. Sincerely,

Ruth Weiss, Annie Blandford Nome, AK 99762

Hello out there,

Unity and Harmony

The recent "One Voice" concert is a wonderful example that different beautiful voices can come together in harmony to produce a fantastic event. Nome can be proud of the amazing folks we have in our midst who volunteered and sang, played, donated, decorated, baked, organized and served to raise funds for Nome's cancer support group the ICANS, and Norton Sound's Make a Patient Smile program.

What is true in the arts can also be applied to other aspects of our community. A single voice can deliver a message. A group of voices can harmonize and the music is uplifting and enlightening. It takes practice, but the result is something joyful and happy. When voices are strident and raised in anger, the result is a cacophony of noise that puts nerves on end and rattles the teeth. We need harmony on all levels of government from school boards to legislature to the congress. On the national level we are strident and hateful. We have neighborhoods at odds with each other; we have congressmen shouting, "Kill the bill." We have senators who are such a bunch of dysfunctional obstructionists that they should be put in a sack with a bunch of cats.

We need harmony. We have many different voices, many different cultures and backgrounds. When we work together we can harmonize and achieve things for the greater good of all. We can be proud of ourselves. Let's take a lesson from the Nome Arts Council and the "One Voice" concert. When we work together we can achieve greatness.

Nome, Alaska where a person could put another person. Do they even check the old houses that haven't been used in forever?

And people do just get on planes and take off without telling anyone because they are afraid that someone might stop them. So some might still be out there.

Then again there is the jetty. With the way the current is, I'm sure they wash out to sea and it's a vast sea.

And then again, I really do believe that there are ghosts just as I believe there is a God. And if there is a God then people are given a chance (maybe) to atone themselves. Or they could be tortured souls that maybe don't realize they passed away and need help passing. Then again—you could reside over their grave. Granted—things like that could happen—anything could happen. That's life.

If I was the producer I would at least tour the area to see how it looks, at least then it might seem more believable. If I had an aerial picture of Nome I'd add it to this letter—just to show them what Nome looks like.

I guess I should be nice now and quit. I hope all of you have a wonderful spring. Summer—lots of fun to go fishing in the spring. It's even more fun to go enjoy the outdoors and go pick greens to give to the elders. You should see their eyes light up—and the smile on their faces is something to see.

Remember to be nice to each other and to enjoy the heck out of visiting each other. That's a lot of fun too.

If you are smart you will train in a profession that you enjoy the most. It is not fun for yourself if you just settle for a job in which you will be unhappy. Just make sure you get your training before being an idiot. At least if you train for what you really enjoy, you'll always have a smile on your face.

Take care you all. God Bless. As always, Karen Nanouk Unalakleet, AK 99684

Dear Editor,

This letter is to all the senators, legislators, Governor of Alaska, state representatives, and to the President of the United States of America.

There are still some villages in Alaska without sewer and running water, but all there is to read in the newspaper is how much money will be spent on roads in the near future.

I do not recall how many years ago, Alaska had a governor whose campaign speech was "If you vote for me, I will put the honey bucket in a museum." And he used that quote twice.

I have been living in Wales, Alaska for 28 years now with no running water or a flush toilet.

How long do the people living in the villages in Alaska have to wait to have the luxury of turning on a faucet to get a drink of water or wash clothes, or take a shower or bath, and flushing a toilet in their own home?

Seems to me if there is money for building roads, there should also be a plan for water and sewer for the villages in Alaska that do not have this luxury.

Wake up Alaska! Thank you, Debra Seetook Wales, AK 99783

Alaska News Briefs

After the 26th Legislature hammered out the state's operational and mental health budget last week, a House resolution that may have big consequences for Nome and the Bering Strait/Norton Sound region has been flying under the radar screen of the Alaska press corps. House concurrent resolution 22 is to establish an Alaska Northern Waters Task Force and it cleared the House community and regional affairs committee and is on the move into the House finance committee. The purpose of the task force is to facilitate regional coordination and State of Alaska leadership in the ongoing development of the United States' policies relating to the opening of Arctic marine transportation routes, national security and resource development. The task force will comprise legislators from northwestern Alaska, leaders from Arctic communities and key federal agencies. Together, they will assess and facilitate the creation of a joint state and federal entity to coordinate United States and Alaska interests that result from the opening of Arctic waters.

The resolution aims to create a joint federal/state commission that guides interagency and inter-jurisdiction actions in the Arctic. It provides an opportunity for Alaska's Legislature and Arctic communities to assume a proactive role in shaping such a body, and ensures that Alaska's unique interests are strongly represented.

The task force would hold hearings in Barrow, Nome and Kotzebue, as well as Anchorage. By meeting in these regions, the task force will be able to seek guidance and feedback from the residents of the regions most likely to experience impacts from increased activity in the Arctic.

The Alaska Northern Waters Task Force will deliver its findings to the Alaska Legislature in January 2012, including legislative proposals for consideration.

Shell Oil gets EPA's OK to drill three exploratory wells

ANCHORAGE (AP)— The Environmental Protection Agency announced last week that it had approved a clean-air permit for Shell to operate its drilling ship in the Chukchi Sea. Shell wants to drill three exploratory wells on the Arctic Ocean acreage it leased in 2008. The company also awaits an air-quality permit for proposed drilling in the Beaufort Sea; a decision will be made this month. Shell spokesman Curtis Smith said delivery of the final Chukchi Sea air permit on the heels of Wednesday's news that the company would continue to have access to offshore acreage obtained in 2008 was excellent news. However, he noted the permit must be listed for 30 days before it becomes usable. and it could be appealed to the Environmental Appeals Board. The U.S. Minerals Management Service estimates the Chukchi holds recoverable reserves of up to 12 billion barrels of oil and 54 trillion cubic feet of natural gas, a promising prospect for oil and gas companies in Alaska, where production has been declining for over two decades.

Senate passes legislation to ensure rural school construction funding

The Alaska Senate voted unanimously last week to guarantee school construction funding for both Rural Education Attendance Areas and Municipal districts. The bill codifies in statue a system for the equitable distribution of school construction funds, something that has historically been done through the yearly budgetary process.

Senate Bill 237 creates an REAA construction fund that would give rural areas the same level of funding predictability that urban areas have. SB 237 now moves to the Alaska House of Representatives for consideration.

passed a resolution sponsored by the Senate Community and Regional Affairs Committee asking that a constitutional amendment be placed before voters this year to increase the size of the legislature. Senate Joint Resolution 21 would add 8 seats to the 40member House of Representatives and 4 seats to the Alaska Senate. Senator Donny Olson, D-Nome, Chair of the Senate Community and Regional Affairs Committee said increasing legislative membership would help address a population growth that has disproportionately favored Alaska's larger, urban areas.

Olson said that Alaska's population has tripled since statehood, with growth coming especially on the road system and in urban areas of the state. This lumps geographically large Senate and House districts together that are comprised of communities that often have little in common, said Olson. Senator Olson said getting SJR 12 passed and the constitutional amendment before the voters in the 2010 general election is critical, as election district boundaries will be redrawn in 2012 based on this year's census. The resolution goes next to the House of Representatives for consideration.

Bill passed requiring corporate and union campaign disclosure

In a response to a federal court ruling that allows corporations to spend unlimited amounts of money on political campaigns, the Alaska Senate passed a bill requiring corporations and labor unions to report their contributions and expenditures in elections. In the wake of the recent U.S. Supreme Court ruling, Citizens United v. Federal Election Commission, Alaska is facing participation by corporations and unions for or against candidates in its elections for the first time. Because this activity had been banned, there are currently no reporting requirements in law for these groups. SB 284 addresses Alaska law to be sure that the public is fully informed of the contributions and expenses of these new participants, both in reports to the Alaska

Cadets recognized at year's first JROTC award ceremony

By Sam Schmidt

On Feb. 25, the Nanook Battalion congregated at Nome-Beltz High School was recognized for their accomplishments.

At the ceremony many cadets were promoted, but probably the most significant was the promotion of Gregory Saclamana and Landis Bjorgen. Saclamana was promoted to the rank of Cadet Lieutenant Colonel and the position of Battalion Commander. Bjorgen was promoted to the rank of Cadet Colonel and the position of Assistant to the Instructor.

At the ceremony the battalion colors, or flags, were passed from Bjorgen to Saclamana. This practice is a tradition for military and JROTC units when there is a change in command. The battalion colors are passed from the battalion cadet command sergeant major, Janet Oquilliuk to the outgoing battalion commander, Bjorgen, who passes through the instructor to the new battalion commander, Saclamana, who then passed them back to the command sergeant major for safe keeping. This action symbolizes the action of one commander relinquishing command of the unit to the incoming commander with the all of the responsibilities associated with commanding the unit.

The ribbons awarded at the ceremony were:

• The Parade Ribbon (awarded to cadets who participated in local community parades): Thomas Ashenfelter, Landis Bjorgen, Nivi Brandt, Damon Buffas, Reed Eide, Katelynn Gray, Kyle Griemmsmann, Elizabeth Herzner, Brandon Lancaster, Janet Oquiliuk, Tara Richards, Gregory Saclamana, Sam Schmidt and Cameron Smith.

• The Community Service Ribbon (awarded to cadets who participated in local community service activities): Jamie Adsuna, Kyle Clark, Brenna Dickson, Kyle Griemmsmann, Elizabeth Herzner, Janet Oquiliuk, Tara Richards, Cameron Smith, Jessica Saclamana, Albert Tall and Sam Schmidt.

The Personal Appearance Ribbon (awarded to cadets who consistently present an outstanding appearance): Cameron Smith, Sam Schmidt, Jessica Saclamana, Gregory

Saclamana, Tara Richards, Janet Oquiliuk, Xaiver Kowchee, Elizabeth Herzner, Kyle Griemmsmann, Katelynn Gray, Reed Eide, Brenna Dickson, Kyle Clark, Nivi Brandt, Landis Bjorgen and Thomas Ashenfelter.

• The Service Learning Ribbon (awarded to cadets who participate in planning community service projects): Elizabeth Herzner, Thomas Ashenfelter, Nivi Brandt, Kyle Clark, Brenna Dickson, Katelynn Gray, Kyle Griemmsmann, Tara Richards and Sam Schmidt.

• The Essay Ribbon (Awarded to cadets who score high on the annual JROTC-themed essay): Landis Bjorgen, Nivi Brandt, Kyle Clark, Elizabeth Herzner, Janet Oquiliuk, Tara Richards, Gregory Saclamana, Jessica Saclamana, Sam Schmidt, Cameron Smith and Thomas Ashenfelter. Ashenfelter was honored for having the best essay this year.

The cadets have achieved a great deal so far this year but plan for even more. The cadets will next be conducting their annual food drive in April to gather food for the local food bank

Sharpshooters make their mark at 2010 Idita-shoot

Submitted by the JROTC

This year's Idita-shoot was again a huge success.

On March 18 there were 31 competitors in four different divisions competing for different prizes donated by businesses in the Nome area with the grand prize being a round tripticket donated by Bering Air. Quality Auto, Nome Arctic Cat, Nome Outfitters, Outsiders Hardware and Wilderness Ski-Doo contributed the rest of the prizes which where distributed to the individuals that placed in either the poker shoot that occurred in early January and the Idita-Shoot.

The Idita-Shoot gives competitors an opportunity to travel the Iditarod trail via air rifle. Competitors shoot at bullseyes that are 4 1/2 centimeters wide at a range of 10 meters, or 33 feet. This creates a challenge for the shooters as they shoot at this range using the standing position without support. Only the first through sixth graders shoot in the prone (lying down) position.

The JROTC cadets conduct shooting events to raise money for their activities account and to increase the competitive spirit within the shooting community. The main reason for these shooting activities is to teach gun safety. The safety rules that are instituted on the air rifle range can be applied to the handling of all guns. The main acronym that is used is MAT for "muzzle, action and trigger." Keep the muzzle pointed in a safe direction at all times, keep the action clear and open until you are ready to shoot, and keep your finger off the trigger until you are ready to shoot your target. By following these safety rules we have not experienced a single gun-related accident within the Nome-Beltz marksmanship program that is in its seventh year.

The JROTC cadets and staff congratulate this year's Idita-Shoot winners.

2010 Idita-Shoot winners:
Division 1 (1st – 6th grade): 1)
Michael Tocktoo, 22; 2) Kalie Knowlton, 15; 3) Starr Erikson, 14; Division 2

Project Manager Randy Romenesko and NPS representatives and that the city has approved a contract with RSA Engineering for the design, engineering and construction administration services for the project.

The agreement calls for completion of the project no later than Oct. 15, 2010. The project currently is out to bid, and an award date is scheduled for the council meeting on April 26, Bahnke reported in a memo to the council.

Software dilemma

A resolution to accept proposals from Caselle, Inc. and Capital Software, Inc. and authorize the city manager to enter into software license, maintenance and support agreements was discussed by council members and personnel from the finance and city clerk's offices before receiving the council's unanimous approval.

The resolution summarizes a process that began in 2007 when the council asked the city to research an integrated computer system to provide more efficient operations to Nome. The city finance office has used a payroll, budgeting and accounting software package on an IBM AS/400 computer since 1993. The city clerk's office handles property taxes, sales taxes, licenses, permits and cash receipts with a manual paper-based system and some rudimentary spreadsheets and Microsoft Access files

In May 2009 the city retained Resource Data, Inc. to analyze workand business/technical requirements of the finance and clerk's offices and to prepare material for a request for information. The city issued an RFI to solicit information from a broad range of potential suppliers of finance software packages. Caselle, Inc./Capital Software and Tyler Technologies were invited to submit quotes through a competitive negotiation process based on the RFI requirements. Bahnke based her recommendation to accept the Caselle/Capital proposal on the evaluation of both proposals and bids submitted by the firms.

A spreadsheet accompanying the resolution shows that Caselle/Capital bid a total of $76,125 for license fees; conversion; set up services and training; and travel, lodging, and per diem. Tyler bid $145,970 for the same components. In addition, Caselle/Capital bid $10,900 for annual operations and maintenance, compared to Tyler's bid of $20,595. The difference in bids submitted for license fees was about 10 percent, with Caselle bidding $35,900 and Tvler $39,860. However in other expense categories, Tyler's cost figures were two to four times higher than those of Caselle/Capital.

Councilman Brown said he had heard that one of the departments was not happy with the choice of Caselle/Capital due to a lack of integration. Noting that he had researched the proposals and found that some cost numbers do not compare to the same things, he said he would like more time to look at the proposals and he wants to hear from the city's Controller Cussy Kauer and City Clerk Sandy Sturgis-Babcock.

Kauer said it does not matter to her which software package the city purchases, adding that she will defer to Payroll Technician Dana Handeland for discussion of the proposals. Kauer said she has worked for the city 36 years, this is the last computer conversion for her as a city employee and that she does not expect to remain a city employee long enough to work with the new software.

"The finance department can run on what we have for a year or so," Kauer said. Noting that the council's mandate was to get the clerk's office off a manual paper-based system, she said no computer conversion can occur in the clerk's office until many hours of data entry work has taken place. "Now we have downtime because the budget is closing—let's get on with it," she urged. She estimated it will take five to six people working weekends to get a computerized system in the clerk's office up and running by July.

Brown said he is aware that personnel from the finance and city clerk's offices spent 100 hours considering the proposals, and he asked Handeland whether it is her firm belief that the Caselle/Capital package will integrate the offices.

"Both [products] will do the job," Handeland replied. She said she developed pros and cons, and then backed Bahnke's choice of Caselle/Capital for reasons that included positive feedback from other users of Caselle/Capital software and cost differentials in the bids. "Caselle.net is the latest and greatest," Handeland added.

Sturgis-Babcock said she had thought the council would decide which software vendor to select at its meeting on April 12, and she needs a couple of more weeks to compare modules. She said she is not sure the city is buying all that it needs from Caselle/Capital. "From what I've seen the [Caselle/Capital] package fits finance better than the clerk's office," she added.

Sturgis-Babcock said she wants Tyler to explain the differences between its bid and that of Caselle/Capital in certain cost areas. Tyler bid $21,595 for travel, lodging and per diem compared to a $5,000 bid from Caselle/Capital; and $58,100 for set up services and training compared to Caselle/Capital's bid of $28,175. Sturgis-Babcock said it is worth taking one more look at Tyler to find out what the costs really are.

Bahnke and Handeland both said that Tyler and Caselle/Capital have different business models, with Tyler's limited to "boots on the ground," meaning that its proposal would cost the city more for travel, lodging and per diem.

Councilman Andersen asked whether anyone had asked Tyler why the firm would charge $58,000 for set up and training?

"I asked," replied Handeland.
"They said that's how we do it."

Noting that the city manager oversees everything and the council relies on her recommendations, Brown asked Bahnke whether in her opinion the resolution must be approved during the March 30 meeting or can wait for two weeks.

Bahnke said a big piece of her decision was based on positive feedback the Nome harbormaster received from Valdez to her inquiry about Caselle/Capital software in relation to port billing. The price was not the only factor considered, Bahnke added. She said she wants to move forward with implementing the plan, and at the end of the day she recommends that the council accept the Caselle/Capital proposal.

"We'll support the city manager's position and make it work," Sturgis-Babcock said. "If it's not on my head, OK."

All council members attended the meeting except for Mary Knodel, who was out of town.

hired by Nome Public Schools. Biscotti's name was among a slate of teachers and administrators recommended to have their credentials revoked or face other disciplinary measures at the August meeting. The commission's approved minutes show that the recommendations for the entire slate were affirmed without debate.

Biscotti informed elementary school staff and Wehde by a March 31 e-mail that she would be leaving for California to tend to an ill family member. She has been out of town ever since. Efforts to reach Biscotti by e-mail for comment on this story were unsuccessful as of press time April 6.

Prior to coming to Nome, Biscotti worked as an educator for years in her home state of California. Her last position before moving to Nome was principal at Rancho Cucamonga Elementary School in the community of the same name in southern California. The Nome Board of Education approved the hire of Biscotti in April 2009. Most recently, the school board renewed her contract for the 2010-2011 school year at its Jan. 12 meeting.

Wehde said at the time of Biscotti's hiring, the district believed all her credentialing was in order. "Her hiring process was unremarkable in that all of the standard assurances and practices were completed at the time," he said.

The California commission's August decision states that all of Biscotti's certification documents were revoked and any pending appeals were denied as a result of what it labeled as misconduct pursuant to two specific California education codes. The first of the two codes mentioned states that the commission "shall privately admonish, publicly reprove, revoke or suspend for immoral or unprofessional conduct, or for persistent defiance of, and refusal to obey, the laws regulating the duties of persons serving in the public school system, or for any cause that would have warranted the denial of an application for a credential or the renewal thereof, or for evident unfitness for service."

The second code mentioned carries a long list of possible transgressions for which the commission can deny any application for a new or renewed certificate. Among the laundry list of reasons are excessive use of intoxicating

"Superintendents don't gumshoe an issue like this."

beverages, addiction to controlled substances, the commission of acts involving moral turpitude, a prior revocation of certification documents and the practice of deception or fraud in an application, among others.

While the California commission's minutes reflect the revocation of Biscotti's certifications, no details or specifics are given as to why the commission found Biscotti to be in violation of the two mentioned statutes.

The investigation into Biscotti's credentials will be handled by Alaska Professional Teaching Practices Commission, which Wehde said works hand-in-hand with the state Department of Education. "Superintendents don't gumshoe an issue like this," Wehde said.

He added that Biscotti will remain on leave until that investigation runs its course. Likening it to a doctor in an operating room without a medical license, Wehde said if a teacher or administrator's certification is in question, there is no other option than to remove them from the school until any fog is lifted. "There's no secondary course of action for a school superintendent to pursue," he said.

Despite the issues surrounding Biscotti's certification in California, she received a temporary administrator's certificate from the State of Alaska. Wehde said the certificate was temporary in nature because Biscotti needed to complete six hours of instruction on culturally responsive education, a requirement that nearly all teachers and administrators still need to complete when new to Alaska.

According to a search on the Alaska Department of Education and Early Development website, the temporary certificate is valid from May 2009 to June 2010. The listing, however, spells Biscotti's first name as "Shary," whereas communications from the Nome district and her former district in California spell her name as "Shari." The latter spelling is also used in the state's public schools database.

Before her departure from Nome, Biscotti sent the elementary school staff and Wehde an e-mail March 31, saying she had to abruptly travel to California to attend to her grand-mother who had undergone emergency surgery. The departure came just as students were preparing to take the tests on which school performance is judged. "I know this is a terrible time, but I do need to see her. I have made arrangements for Jon [Berkeley] to be there," she wrote. "He can take care of all your needs. I am not sure of my return date yet. For now, I can be reached through email."

Wehde said Biscotti's concern for her grandmother's health was well-known in the school before the credentialing issue came up and described the timing of her departure as coincidental.

Teachers at the elementary school were told Monday afternoon by Berkeley that he would serve as the acting principal until further notice. Berkeley currently works in the district office in a number of roles for Nome Public Schools, including handling Native education and the coordination of federal programs. He had applied for the elementary school principal position when the district started its search to replace Carl White last year. The district widened its search beyond the immediate area and ultimately hired Biscotti.

Nome Elementary Principal Shari Biscotti

The turmoil at the elementary school comes as the district's secondary school, Nome-Beltz Junior/Senior High School, deals with controversial turnover at the top. In a move that split many in the community and spurred a recall vote against all five of its members, the school board voted Jan. 12 to not renew the contracts of Principal Janeen Sullivan and Assistant Principal Doug Boyer. The board has never given a reason for its decision, a result of a split vote, despite the fact that the two administrators had received positive evaluations from Superintendent Jon Wehde.

When Biscotti introduced herself to the community during a reception in May, she cited her experience of rising through the ranks in various California schools before moving into administrative roles. She talked about "flipping" underperforming schools as a principal so that they would meet state and federal performance benchmarks.

At that meeting she said she was nearly ready to come to work in Alaska for the Kenai Peninsula Borough School District as the principal of the Tyonek School. She said her mind was changed after several persuasive phone calls from the Nome superintendent at the time, Rick Luthi. Current Superintendent Wehde was hired just days after the school board approved Biscotti's contract.

state had presented insufficient evidence that he was aware of the risk that Takak would physically assault Christina.

Subsequently, in response to Johnson's motion for acquittal, Judge Ben Esch denied Johnson an acquittal, but ordered a new trial. Johnson appealed to a higher court that reversed Esch's finding and sent the case back to the trial court for Johnson to be sentenced on the manslaughter verdict. Johnson went to the Alaska Supreme Court.

Johnson argued throughout that even if it were found he had been aware that Takak was starving Christina, he had no reason to be aware of a particular danger that Takak might assault Christina, and the death from the head injury took the issue of Johnson's awareness and protection from starvation off the table. In its opinion, the court of appeals said it was sufficient that Johnson was aware that Takak was trying to kill Christina.

The Supreme Court's opinion said the court of appeal's standard for responsibility was too broad, and sent the case back to the court of appeals for a closer look, saying a "defendant's liability for harm to another is not limitless because natural consequences are those a reasonable person could have foreseen," according to court records.

"Because in this case the court of appeals applied a foreseeability standard that did not expressly include a consideration of remoteness we vacate its decision and remand for further proceedings with the standard articulated in this opinion."

A part of that opinion handed down to the court of appeals was, "A trier of fact must determine whether the actual harm was within the scope of risk hazarded by the defendant's [in this case, Johnson's] conduct."

Underlying the court proceedings had been the differentiation of civil liability and criminal liability in a parent neglecting to protect a child from harm.

Johnson has served approximately three years in jail since his conviction.

Conger makes history at Nordic ski championships

By WISA staff

Nearly 50 rural Alaskan skiers and biathletes negotiated spring snow conditions and a winding, challenging course in Tanana this past weekend while competing in the 23rd annual Western Interior Ski and Biathlon Championships.

Of the many outstanding performances produced by the athletes, one turned out to be record-breaking.

Nome's Emerson Conger won gold medals in the 9-kilometer ski race, the biathlon race, and had the fastest split in the team relays. His endeavors would help him lay claim to a third straight high school boys Ski Meister Award, the first in the history of rural state skiing and biathlon to do so.

Including a junior high Ski Meister Award earned as an eighth grader, Conger's 2010 Ski Meister Award was his fourth overall, tying him with Arnold Marks of Tanana, who first completed the feat in 1999. During his current run, Conger has won 12 consecutive Western Interior Championship races.

Conger's efforts were supported by Nome teammate, and first-time Western Interior Championships medalist, Sam Schmidt. Schmidt earned silver in the 9-kilometer race and, despite breaking his ski, a bronze in the biathlon.

The duo led the Nome team to their second straight high school boys' team title, becoming only the third team in Western Interior history to do so. Nome's streak still lags well behind the seven straight won by White Mountain between 1997 and 2003.

White Mountain would go on to take second place, piloted by the bronze- and silver-medal performances of Asa Bergamaschi. Although rival competitors at this meet, Conger and Bergamaschi were teammates on the Team Alaska biathlon squad at last month's 2010 Arctic Winter Games in Grande Prairie, Alberta, Canada.

The team from Galena, lead by Francis Katongan, took third place.

Also winning all three of her races was Sierra Corsetti, a home school student living in Unalakleet who raced as an independent. Corsetti skied away from the high school girls' competition to capture her second Ski Meister Award.

Corsetti, also a 2010 Team Alaska Arctic Winter Games biathlon member, enjoyed a 5 1/2 minute margin in the biathlon over double-silver medalist Ana Lee Swanson, also of Unalakleet.

Teammates Caitlyn Tozier and Miranda Murphy (another 2010 Arctic Winter Games biathlete) traded bronze medal spots on the podium in the ski race and biathlon, respectively.

The pair would use a gold medal in the team relay to capture Nome's first high school girls' team trophy, outlasting the Nenana team, which was buoyed by Danny Fisher. Galena, led by Zoey Niksik, finished third.

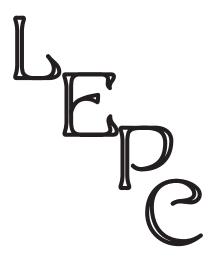

While there was little drama in either of the high school Ski Meister

Awards, the same was not true for the junior high girls, whose division saw the deepest competition at the meet.

In one of the closest Ski Meister contests in Western Interior Ski and Biathlon Championships history, gold medal biathlete Aly Daniels of Unlalakeet won her first Ski Meister Award by exploiting a nine-second advantage in her relay split on the final day of competition to edge Rosa Schimdt of Nome, the gold medalist in the 4.5-kilometer ski race.

Unalakeet took Daniels' results and utilized bronze-medal performances from sister Katie Daniels in the ski race, and from teammate Jonisha Wilson in the biathlon, to earn the third straight junior high girls' team trophy. Only the dominant late '90s junior high girls teams from White Mountain have more consecutive team trophies (seven) than Unalakleet.

Schmidt would use her gold and silver medals to solidify the Nome team's second-place finish. Romay Harris, from Galena, would lead her team to third place.

In the junior high boys division, a dual for the Ski Meister Award ensued between skiers from sites that had never medaled at the rural state championships, much less a Western Interior Ski Meister Award.

On the final day of competition, Corey Ningeulook of Shishmaref, the 4.5-kilometer ski race gold medalist, would use a faster relay split to outlast biathlon gold medalist Dominic Richardson (the only biathlete at the meet to "shoot clean," hitting 10 out 10 targets) of Saint Michael.

Ningeulook would also guide Shishmaref to its first team title. The team from Golovin, led by Hank Henry, and the team from Galena, led by double-bronze medalist Kaleb Korta, would go on to take second and third place, respectively.

The Western Interior Ski and Biathlon Championships is one of the largest biathlon events held in the United States each year. Participants in the biathlon ski twice around a 2.7-kilometer course, each time stopping at a shooting range where they find a 22-caliber rifle and a personal range safety officer waiting for them.

Just a few of the Western Interior Ski and Biathlon Championships competitors have access to established biathlon ranges and targets in their villages and small cities, so junior high competitors are allowed to shoot with a rest.

During each shooting bout, competitors take five shots in the prone position at 4.5-inch targets, which are placed 50 meters down range. Each missed shot results in the athlete performing a short, but time- and energy-consuming penalty lap.

Nenana's Chuck Hugny, a 21-year veteran of the event, served as the range safety manager for the 2010 championships. Two-time Olympic Biathlon Team member Rachel Steer was in attendance and provided the athletes with a biathlon clinic.

In 1986, the Western Interior Ski/Biathlon Association created an event that would allow skiers and biathletes from rural locations around the state to experience high level ski and biathlon competition. The resulting Western Interior Ski and Biathlon Championships are regarded as the rural state ski and biathlon championships.

WISA has four spots reserved on the Arctic Winter Games teams for winners of its biathlon competition. Next year is an Arctic Winter Games qualification year for the Western Interior Ski/Biathlon Championships. The event will be held in White Mountain.

Obama OK's drilling in Alaska outer continental shelf

By Diana Haecker

The Obama administration got a mixed bag of reactions when on March 31 Department of Interior Secretary Ken Salazar announced a decision to allow existing leases in the Chukchi and Beaufort Seas to remain open but to cancel planned lease sales in the Bristol Bay region so the federal government can further study the impact on the environment and oil-spill risks.

This was part of a broader decision by Salazar on the current and proposed 5-year Outer Continental Shelf oil and gas leasing programs and includes the green light to drilling in the Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico. Alaska Senators Lisa Murkowski and Mark Begich released a joint press release saying they appreciate the administration's effort to keep the existing leases open - some fetching record amounts when bid on in 2008 - but urged the administration to continue to fund environmental studies in the North Aleutian Basin so that a more informed decision can be made about possible development in the future.

Murkowski maintains that drilling for domestic oil is a national security issue. "Even as we transform America's energy landscape, we're going to need a lot of oil for many years. For the sake of our nation's economy, our national security, and for the world's environment, the more of that oil we can produce domestically the better," Murkowski said.

The plan allows exploratory activity in the Chukchi and Beaufort seas; delays four planned sales in the same areas and suspends leasing activity in the North Aleutian Basin. While Murkowski didn't comment on the president's decision to keep Bristol Bay off limits for drilling, Begich

Does folic acid increase risk of cancer?

By Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

Some patients have been concerned about new data showing a possible link between folic acid supplementation and an increased risk of cancer. The issue was brought to light last year in a study out of Norway that found patients taking folic acid in mega-doses were more likely to develop certain cancers than those who did not take supplements.

The increased risk is low and does not outweigh the clear benefit of dietary folic acid, especially in women of childbearing age, but the research may be important to patients who are required to take high doses of folic acid as part of treatment for a chronic

Grains and cereals in the United States have been fortified with folic acid since 1998 as part of a largely successful effort to reduce birth defects. Folic acid, along with other B vitamins, has also been investigated as a means of lowering the risk of cardiovascular disease and certain cancers. It was a study on cardiovascular disease risk reduction that raised concerns about the harmful effects of folic acid taken in high

The study, published in the November 18 issue of the Journal of the American Medical Association (JAMA) reviewed 6,837 heart patients from two studies in Norway conducted from 1998 to 2005. Patients in these studies were given 800 micrograms of folic acid daily (twice the recommended daily allowance) for a little over three years and compared to similar patients who took only a placebo. Researchers found that 10 percent of patients taking folate developed cancer whereas only 8.4 percent of patients who received a placebo developed cancer. This represented a 21 percent increase in cancer, particularly lung cancer, for those taking folic acid.

The study raises questions about the safety of folic acid in high doses and may be confusing, if not concerning, to people who are prescribed folic acid or who take folic acid as part of a daily supplement. So here is a little perspective:

First, folic acid, also called folate or B9, is one of the B vitamins known to be vital for healthy cell growth. A nutritional deficiency of folate can lead to severe forms of anemia in adults and severe birth defects in the brain and spine of children. Fortification of the food supply has helped lower the rate of birth defects in the United States. The recommended daily allowance of folic acid in the U.S. diet is 400 micrograms. At this recommended dose, folic acid may also reduce the risk of cardiovascular disease and certain cancers, like breast and colon cancer. Patients in the Norway studies were given twice this recommended amount.

Second, the Norway researchers point out that folic acid is not necessarily the cause of cancer, but rather folic acid may induce an acceleration phenomenon, meaning it causes a rapid growth of cancer that is already present. Patients at increased risk for developing cancer due to family history or cancer-causing behaviors, like tobacco use, will want to review this information with their provider before taking high doses of folic

Third, folic acid taken in high doses is important for some patients who take medication that competes with folate in the body or causes a loss of folic acid from the body. For example, patients taking methotrexate for rheumatoid arthritis or psoriasis must supplement their diet with high dose folic acid to avoid the effects of folate deficiency. Doctors will sometimes prescribe supplemental folic acid for patients taking certain seizure medications or blood pressure medications called diuretics. The benefit of replacing folic acid in these cases far outweighs the relatively small increased risk of cancer seen in the Norway study.

Finally, it is important to remember that the most important sources of folic acid do not come from medication, but are found in vegetables, beans, and fortified breads. Spinach, broccoli, lentils, lima beans, asparagus, and fortified whole grain breads each provide 25-30 percent of the daily recommended amount of folic acid in each serving. Many fortified cereals have 100 percent of the recommended allowance per serving. There is little, if any, need to worry about acquiring cancer from healthy dietary sources of folic acid, and women of childbearing age should ensure they are getting the recommended 400 micrograms daily.

Until more is known about the effects of folic acid in doses over 400 micrograms, patients at increased risk of cancer, especially lung cancer, should confer with their provider before taking high-dose folic acid supplements.

said that it would make sense to curtail oil and gas development in Bristol Bay, the site of the world's largest salmon fishery.

The most enthusiastic reaction to the federal OCS plan came from a coalition of Native and fishery-related organizations. The Alaska Marine Conservation Council, Alaska Independent Fishermen's Marketing Assoc., Nunamta Aulukestai and the Bering Sea Fishermen's Association called the decision an important victory for the Bristol Bay's residents and Alaska's fishermen who depend upon the continued health of the region's fisheries and have been battling offshore oil and gas proposals for over 20 years. David Harsila, President of the Alaska Independent Fishermen's Marketing Association wants to go further and get permanent protection. "Bristol Bay's salmon resource is like no other on Earth and provides thousands of jobs to fishermen across Alaska and the west coast," Harsila said. "Our organization and hundreds of member fishermen are thrilled with this decision, but want to see something permanent so we don't have to fight this battle again."

Congressman Don Young didn't share the Bristol Bay region's enthusiasm and used strong language bashing the five-year plan and the moratorium on drilling in certain parts. "While I appreciate the President's seeming departure from his extreme environmental left supporters, all I'm seeing in this exploration 'plan' is smoke and mirrors," said Young. "The President is saying all of the right things but actions speak much louder than words, and this new 'plan' is just a continuation of this Administration's inaction on making the United States energy independent; it will do nothing to end our dependence on foreign oil and nothing to end the export of billions of dollars we send overseas every

Young was not happy about the plan and said that subjecting previously studied areas to even more study would be a waste of taxpayer all oil and gas development to a loss of jobs.

Parnell said that an estimated 25 billion barrels of oil and 120 trillion time and dollars. "This plan closes more than it opens, and is a complete farce. There is no question that this 'Obama Moratorium' will have dire impacts on the economic future of our country," Young said.

Alaska Governor Sean Parnell also expressed concern with the oil and gas-leasing plan. He criticized the uncertainty about future OCS leasing in Alaska and links the president's reservation to fling the door open to cubic feet of natural gas could be potentially found and if not developed, economic doomsday would be the consequence. "By not maintaining a predictable lease program in the Alaska OCS, 35,000 job opportunities are still unavailable to Alaskans, the cost of energy will go up, and the U.S. will continue to depend on imported oil. At a time when the U.S. economy is weak, we need high-paying jobs associated with the development and use of domestic petroleum and the increased energy security that come from Alaska production," said Parnell.

Parnell announced he would file strong comments on behalf of Alaska in the 30-day public comment period to the plan. Alaska state senator Lesil McGuire, the chair of the Senate Energy Committee and co-chair of the Senate Resources Committee, said that she appreciated that Alaskan voices were heard, but also took the position to allow more drilling. "We, as state legislators, often feel very powerless when it comes to dealing with the Federal Government, so I was happy to hear that some of the concerns we voiced were considered by the President," she said. McGuire said,"The ability to develop Alaska's offshore resources is imperative to our energy future."

On the other side of the spectrum of reactions, the environmental group Center for Biological diversity called the plan a disaster for wildlife and climate. Brendan Cummings, senior counsel at the Center for Biological Diversity said that the plan will further feed the nation's addiction to oil, will contribute to global warming is poised to directly despoil the habitat of polar bears, endangered whales, and other imperiled wildlife. The group said that oil development in the Beaufort and Chukchi seas, home to all of America's polar bears, is strongly opposed by conservation groups, as no technologies exist to clean up oil spills in icy waters.

The revision of the 5-year plan came as a response to a lawsuit by three environmental groups and the village of Point Hope. A federal appeals court ruled that the Interior Department under the Bush administration did not properly study the environmental impact of expanding oil and gas drilling off Alaska's coast before issuing its five-year leasing program.

Obituary

Doris Susan "Kayaqtuq" Lincoln

Doris Susan "Kayaqtuq" Lincoln, 80, died Feb. 27 in Kotzebue. Her family wrote that "She left this earth."

A funeral was held March 4 at the Kotzebue Friends Church, and burial followed at the Catholic cemetery, where she was laid to rest next to her husband, Rodney Lincoln, Sr.

A kind and respected elder of Kotzebue, Doris was born Dec. 3, 1929 in Golovin to John and Minnie Fagerstrom.

Growing up on the shores of Golovin Bay gave Doris a deep appreciation for her Inupiat culture. Doris left Alaska to complete her education, graduating from Roosevelt High School in Seattle, where she met and married Rodney Lincoln. The couple made Kotzebue their home and raised six children: Rodney "Butch" Jr., Blanche "Bebix," Linda, Richard, Dood and Omie.

Doris was proud to live and practice her culture. She constantly made efforts to blend the Inupiat ways of life with the 20th- and 21st-century style of living. Doris enjoyed fishing on Kobuk Lake, bird hunting on the Noatak, picking greens and berries, skin sewing and doll making. She enjoyed gathering and preparing local delicacies that include Native seafoods, waterfowl, berries and small and big game.

Doris was devoted to her family and honored to be a wife, mother, grandmother and great-grandmother. Her family in return showered her with the same love, respect and affection.

Doris is survived by her sisters, Myrtle Johnson of Nome and Maggie Olson of Golovin; and brother, Jerry Fagerstrom of Minnesota; and her children, Victor Karmun (stepson), Linda and Roger Mauer, Richard Lincoln, Dood and fiance Joe Carr, and Omie and Bob McGuffey. She is also survived by numerous grandchildren, Nancy Campos, Sandra Motter, and Douglas "Chip" Fields, Rodney "Butch" Lincoln III, Anthony Edward Lincoln, Allison Lincoln, Marley P. Lincoln, Donald Schaeffer Lincoln, Quentin Allen Upicksoun, Scott E. Upicksoun, Charles Peter Upicksoun, Hilary Joyce Upicksoun, John Fagerstrom

Lincoln, Meagan Carol Lincoln, Doris Rose Lincoln, Anna Lucille Lincoln, Duke W. McGuffey, and Niki Blu McGuffey; and greatgrandchildren, Rodney Uan IV and James Davena Lincoln, Ida Lee Lincoln, Tristen Jay Lincoln, Tyler Huntington, and Trent and Sadie Ellison, Duke Axle McGuffey, and Christina, Loren, Danielle, Laura and Devin Fields; and her dear friend, Ida Hadley.

Doris was preceded in death by her parents, John and Minnie Fagerstrom; husband, Rodney Lincoln Sr.; children, Rodney Jr. "Butch," Blanche "Bebix"; step-daughter, Meda Sheldon; and eight siblings, Ruth, Gladys, Jack, Chuck and Floyd Fagerstrom, Joyce Tucker, Rose Jones and Ernest Burgh; and her dear friends, Ida Richards, Ida Evern, Marie Fields and Marian Davidovics.

The family and friends mourn the passing of this cherished and esteemed elder of the Kotzebue community. She will be greatly missed by all who knew her.

Council pulls a U-turn on Front Street

By Sandra L. Medearis

Nome folks turning down state money? Impossible as it seems, that may have happened Monday evening at a regular meeting of the Nome Common Council.

After applauding a site for a $39 million new state office building at the north end of Steadman Street last month, the Nome Common Council Monday evening rejected that site. At the urging of folks who told them during public comments they did not want to see state offices leave Front Street, the panel unanimously passed a new resolution welcoming the new building, but asking the state to consider other sites and combinations on or near the "main drag."

The measure replaces the resolution, approving the site, that state DOTPF engineer Matt Desalernos said gave him a "permission slip" to go ahead with plans to purchase land from the mining company for a 60,000 square foot (1.3 acre) state facility. The new structure would replace a deteriorating, stormdamaged state building on Front Street.

A meeting at Pioneers Igloo April 8 and persuasive efforts headed by Nome Chamber of Commerce and Native corporations with office buildings already on Front Street brought people opposing the northern site before the council to sway them toward passing a resolution approving the state building but rescinding approval of the Steadman Street site.

A facility on the property to be purchased from Alaska Gold Co., protesters predicted, would continue to drain business activity, small-town atmosphere and rental income away from Front Street, and, at the same time, school bus driver Louie Green Jr. declared, create a traffic and safety hazard in the vicinity of Steadman Street and Sixth Avenue.

Such a plan would pull down property values, Mitch Erickson, director of the Nome Chamber of Commerce, observed.

Richard Beneville, a tour operator, did not want to see more vacancies diminish the mystique of Front Street.

"It would behoove us all in the community to work together," he said. "I urge the council to think again. Front Street is like the lifeblood of Nome. In Santa Barbara and New York, they have heard of Nome's Front Street. The beauty of Nome is that it does have a Front Street. Sitnasuak and Bering Straits Native corporations have sent lobbvists to Juneau to stop state funds to the state public facilities department for a building away from Front Street, asking legislators and the governor for further research on the project. HARPOON THROWING-Kotzebue's Kirk Howard won the target harpoon throwing contest, under the watchful eyes of Kotzebue elders enjoying Spring Carnival activities while the weather permitted.

Winter hinders Kotzebue's Spring Carnival

By Diana Haecker

A low-pressure weather system sweeping across northwestern Alaska put a crimp into plans of an expanded Arctic Circle spring festival in Kotzebue, held April 7-11.

Events like harpoon throwing, snow sculpting and a snowshoe race contest were a go when weather let up on Sunday. But the Archie Ferguson/Willie Goodwin Memorial snowmachine race scheduled for Saturday was postponed due to the blizzard that dumped wet snow and hammered the coast with wind gusts of more than 45 mph. On Sunday, weather cleared up, but the snowmachiners couldn't go because mushers competing in the Kobuk 440 sled dog race were on their way back to Kotzebue on the same trail. Bad weather prevented a start for the snowmachine riders on Monday as well.

The Arctic Circle Championship sprint mushing race, scheduled for April 9-11 started on Friday, but race officials called the race off for the remaining two days due to the blizzard. The 20-mile trail essentially covering a triangle on the sea ice in front of Kotzebue, fell victim to rapidly increasing overflow, forcing organizers to cancel the highcaliber event that drew sprint mushers from Kotzebue as well as Shishmaref, Knik, Willow, Fairbanks and Talkeetna.

Senate budgets $5 million for Nome's Foster building

By Laurie McNicholas

The capital budget approved by the Alaska Senate includes $5 million for construction of the Richard Foster Building and $500,000 for the Nome Recreation Center Emergency Shelter, noted Mayor Denise Michels in her written report to the Nome Common Council dated April 9.

Funding for the Foster building, which will house the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum collections, is the council's top state legislative priority.

Councilman Stan Andersen presided at the council meeting on Monday in the absence of Michels, who was on work-related travel status. Andersen praised Michels and Museum Director Laura Samuelson for working effectively with legislators to obtain funding for

Nome projects. Andersen traveled to Juneau April 1 with Michels, Samuelson and City Manager Josie Bahnke to meet with Sen. Donny Olson and Rep. Neal Foster and to School budget talks dwell on principals By Tyler Rhodes

A hearing designed to gather comment on the school district's budget turned largely into a public plea to maintain the assistant principal position at the junior high and high school as three of the five school board members sat silently taking testimony at the elementary school April 6.

While the proposed budget entails pages and pages covering everything from lunch and transportation costs to salaries and building maintenance expenses, it was just the one item that spurred the public to come forward and address the board. "Tonight, personnel issues have led the charge," Superintendent Jon Wehde said at the close of the meeting, noting that any questions or concerns over the proposed budget for the next school year can still be brought to him.

It was the second meeting in a row in which the assistant principalboth in terms of the job position and its current holder—took center stage. As the board debates its budget for 2010-2011, decisions on what gets funded or what does not could result in some job positions disappearing or changing next year.

Board member Albert McComas has stated that he does not support maintaining the assistant principal position at Nome-Beltz Junior/Senior High School, while fellow board member Kirsten Timbers has questioned whether a dean of students would better serve the school. Neither board member was at the April 6 hearing.

Dear Editor,

My given name is Ben Henry; my fiction name is Ben Henry. I'd like to respond to Eleanor Amaktoolik's letter concerning the unjustified shooting of her brother, Joseph. Trooper Stroebele not only violated laws in killing this man, he caused severe trauma to the friends and family of this man.

Many of you will now know, it is against the law to even charge a mentally retarded person of any felonies, less shoot them. These people are protected against this type of

I was 50 years old when trooper Stroebele tazed me four times for not "complying" with his "orders." Well, today my heart is not the same as it used to be. Ever since that tazing, I have problems breathing, weakness, muscle spasms and mental anguish, every time I see a trooper!

A couple of years ago again, I was body slammed by a trooper here in the village while handcuffed! I did not break any laws for them to even contact my family or me. They threatened to take our children away and charge my wife with felony crimes (she's also considered A.D.D.).

The abuse will stop; we will not put up with false authority! Period! My heart goes out to the Amaktoolik family.

Don't Eat That Carrot!

The State of Alaska wants to build a new office building on the north end of Steadman near Sixth Avenue. They want to purchase the land from the Alaska Gold Company. The large lot is on permafrost and adjacent to some old fuel tanks. The level of possible contamination is uncertain. The State wants to vacate its office building on Front Street. Will the state tear down the old building or just abandon it?

Do we really want to put a big office building near the Sixth Avenue hinterlands? Why not put it downtown close to where the other offices, shops, post office, court, hotels, restaurants, library, museum, visitor center and city hall are located? We have a couple large lots available and empty office space downtown. Let's use it for state offices. The state could lease the property. Let's not let downtown become a ghost town. We need to jump on our civic pride bandwagon and spruce up Front Street. Let's start with that butt ugly Wein Building. It's an embarrassment. It's been empty for at least 20 years. Condemn it or move it. Let's get some cosmetic beautification projects going on Front Street. Clean sidewalks, street lamps, pocket parks and flower baskets would help. So would a few park benches for weary pedestrians and visitors. Some neat trash cans would do. Last year we kept the old blue barrels all year. Those beige and red cans were much nicer.

We have to keep our downtown alive. We can't abandon our historic heart because the State Department of Transportation and Public Facilities dangles a financial carrot in front of us. Let's forget the carrot and go for some salad and steak. Let's plan to keep downtown the main business part of Nome. Let's make Front Street beautiful and user friendly. We love our town. - N.L.M.-

Foster's Report

Down to the Final Week

By Rep. Neal Foster

The legislative session will end on April 18. This is the second year for the 26th Legislature and all current bills that have not passed by the April 18 will automatically die unless they become the subject of a special session. Things will begin to move very quickly since the Legislature is under the 24 hour rule and the notification on bills to be heard need only be given on the prior day instead of the prior week.

Capital Budget

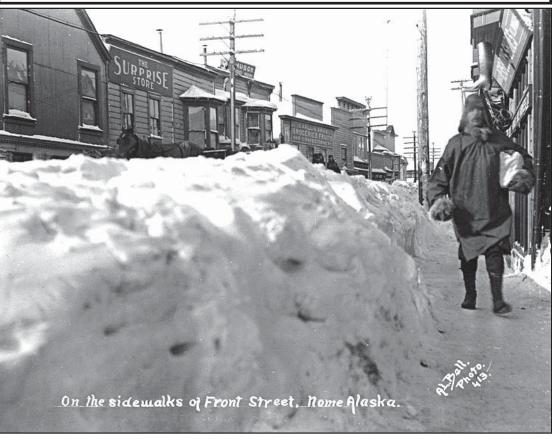

The Senate Finance Committee passed out a Capital Budget Committee Substitute late on April 7. There are several items of general interest to people of the region. One area that can be confusing is funding for the Village Safe Water projects that were listed in the governor's Capital Budget. The Senate CS does not show any amounts for individual projects, but they are funded as a lump sum. The projects are:

Emmonak: Water and Sewer Mains and Upgrades, $1,815,752; Gambell Water Storage System and Sewer System Improvements, $191,525; Golovin Sanitation Master Plan Update, $99,680; Golovin Water Storage Tank, $107,810; Hooper Bay Piped Water and Sewer System, 1,702,268; Kotlik Piped

Dept. of Revenue expects $900 million more in state

The Department of Revenue is expecting that the state will have $900 million more than expected for the current and upcoming budget years because of higher-than-expected oil prices. The department said it expects new or continued development this year but it also noted a decline in North Slope oil production. It is expecting that the state will have collected $5.6 billion in unrestricted general fund revenue for the current spending year and $5.3 billion for the next year. Meanwhile, Senators are feeling the heat from Governor Sean Parnell as they added $76 million to the proposed capital budget for construction and maintenance, including $1 million for a public safety building in White Mountain. Parnell called the capital budget overstuffed and warned that it would overheat the economy. It proposes to spend roughly $1.16 billion in state general funds and double the amount in federal funds. Senate passes energy bill

The Senate unanimously passed the Alaska Sustainable Energy Act last week, a bill that is hoped to lower energy costs, create greater energy efficiency and increased use of renewable energy in Alaska. The bill includes energy efficiency revolving loan programs to fund energy efficiency improvements in public buildings. School districts, municipalities and state government will have access to the funds needed to upgrade their facilities. SB 220 authorizes the Alaska Housing Finance Corporation to issue $250 million in bonds to capitalize the loan fund. It links benefits from the state's Heating Assistance Program to the price of oil, providing additional assistance to low-income families when fuel prices are high. The bill also asks the Governor to evaluate how best to coordinate the State's energy to avoid duplication of efforts. The governor is directed to provide a plan to the legislature by January of 2011. The bill puts nuclear back into the energy mix and enables proponents of small-scale nuclear energy projects to apply for funding from the state's Power Project Fund. The bill creates an emerging energy technology fund that would provide grants for testing energy technologies in Alaska. This, legislators hope, would foster innovation and enable Alaskans to develop solutions to our energy challenges in Alaska; creating high-tech jobs and spurring investment in our economy. The bill, SB 220, has passed the Senate and is before the House.

Governor BoG appointees fail legislative confirmation

Legislators rejected Governor Sean Parnell's pick for a seat at the Board of Game. On Friday lawmakers in a joint session voted 31-27 against Al Barrette to the state Board of Game and also refused to ok Nancy Bienvenue to the Board of Nursing. Legislators told AP that Barrette's voting record on the BoG since February reflected against Native subsistence and local interests. Parnell said that while he was disappointed that the Legislature failed to confirm Al Barrette for the Board of Game, he would remain committed to selecting nominees who will ensure that there is abundant wildlife for Alaska families who depend upon it. He added that it's a sad day when qualified Alaskans such as Nancy Bienvenue step forward to serve on these boards and get treated like a political football. The Legislature's action requires the governor to make new appointments to the Game Board and the Board of Nursing, subject to confirmation by the Legislature.

USFW proposes ANWR as designated wilderness

U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service announced an update of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge's 22-year-old Comprehensive Conservation Plan, including consideration of new wilderness designations within ANWR. This drew resistance from Governor Parnell and US Senator ment that the Obama administration would be wrong to pursue new wilderness in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge or anywhere else in Alaska. He vowed to fight any effort to block development of the enormous oil and gas resources likely beneath the Arctic Refuge. Governor Sean Parnell said that it is a mistake for the federal government to initiate yet another planning process in ANWR and called it the most promising unexplored petroleum region in North America. There will be several opportunities for public comment on the conservation plan. The governor said the State of Alaska will participate "vigorously" in this process, which is expected to take two years.

State focuses to fight Endangered Species listings

Attorney General Dan Sullivan was recently named co-chair of a new working group of attorneys general focusing on issues involving the Endangered Species Act, ESA for short. He spoke to Alaska legislators on Monday, saying that those issues remain on the front burner in his office. He said that a core priority of the Department of Law is helping create and defend a legal framework in the state that promotes opportunities for economic growth and prosperity.

The Legislature is willing to fund an additional attorney for ESA issues. The state maintains that ESA listings lead to extensive regulation of economic activity, and expansive critical habitat designations made without meaningful consultation with the state of Alaska would jeopardize economic growth. In response to an appeal by Sullivan, the National Association of Attorneys General recently established an Endangered Species Act Working Group, which he will co-chair with New Mexico Attorney General Gary King. This group is a forum for discussion, ideas, and action to address the complex issues raised by the ESA. Among ESA-related actions taken by the state, the Department of Law is challenging the listing of the polar bear as threatened, and the Department of Fish and Game is objecting to the proposed critical habitat designation for Cook Inlet beluga whales.

The three remaining members, Gloria Karmun, Barb Nickels and Heather Payenna, heard the testimony of 20 members of the public, most of whom asked for the budget to be passed as is and all asking that the assistant principal job be kept. Many of those speaking also asked that current assistant principal Doug Boyer and principal Janeen Sullivan again be offered their contracts for next year. The two Nome-Beltz administrators were denied contracts for the 2010-2011 school year in a split vote by the board Jan. 12.

While some critiqued the possible elimination of the assistant principal job on fiscal grounds and others questioned how the school could be run with one fewer accredited administrator, an overall sense of frustration, sadness and exhaustion pervaded the discourse directed at the board members. "I haven't seen anything good come from these school board meetings for the last few months," said Nome resident and parent Mike Quinn. "So I am asking to continue with the status quo....We need some stability here."

Stability was a common theme throughout the comments. Teacher and parent Mari Lammer recounted how her adult daughter had witnessed seven different administrators in her four years at Nome-Beltz. Lammer said those four years were tough for her as a parent. She said the past couple of years her younger daughter has spent at the high school have been much better. "Support has been given to us as parents. It has been good for a lot of kids, not just our daughter," Lammer said. "I spend a lot of time there. It's a good thing."

Lloyd Perrigo, a teacher at the Nome Youth Facility and a grandparent of students, spoke to how nearly every aspect of the district's leadership currently seems to be on shaky ground. In addition to the potential changes facing the Nome-Beltz administration, all five school board members are facing recall votes next month and the principal of Nome Elementary School was placed on paid leave at the beginning of the month as her credentials came into question. "We're in a crisis situation in the school district," Perrigo said. "I don't' think anyone wants to see all eight [five board members and three administrators] of you go. I don't think that's the change we want to see in our district."

Perrigo has consistently asked the board to reconsider its January decision and reinstate the two Nome-Beltz administrators for next year. He again put his request out to the board April 6. "They are qualified. They are here. I think they want to stay here. I strongly urge you to consider keeping them," he said.

Parent and former board member Lynette Schmidt described the dean position as "dumbing down" the assistant principal position, a move she said "sends our district into further turmoil.

Liz Korenek-Johnson, an elementary school teacher, said she felt like the district was the laughing stock of the state at the moment as it dealt with the turmoil. Korenek-Johnson spoke in favor of keeping the assistant principal position at the high school as well as giving more administrative support to the elementary school.

Parent David Head said he has heard from people from all over the state who were aware of the situation between the board, a large segment of the public and the administration at the high school. He said, in contrast to Korenek-Johnson's perception, that Nome's school district was no laughing stock. "People around the state aren't laughing, but there are a lot of people watching, and they are watching with great interest to see what is going to come out of this," he said. "This isn't funny to anybody with a sane mind."

In addressing the board, many spoke to the idea of replacing the assistant principal with a dean of students. The two jobs would differ more than just in terms of name and salary. While both positions would provide support to the building's main principal, the scope of work a dean could perform is limited.

An assistant principal is required to hold an administrative certificate from the state. A dean would only need to have a teacher's certificate. Currently the job of evaluating the teachers at Nome-Beltz is split between the building's two administrators. Without a second administrative certificate holder in the building, the job would fall solely on the principal.

Erika Eaton addressed the board, speaking to the full workload she sees the two administrators carrying from her vantage as a high school teacher. Noting that the school is required to always have at least one certified administrator on site anytime school or school-sanctioned activities are in session, Eaton said she felt the assistant principal job was vital to managing the school in a safe and viable manner. "I think this is an extremely necessary position we can't get rid of, and that we can't replace with a dean of students," she said.

With all that is asked of the building's administrators, including the implementation of the district's new strategic plan, Eaton questioned the wisdom of whittling down the support at the top—especially when the board wants two new people in the job at the start of next year. "There's just so, so, so much to do; I can't imagine having one less administrator," Eaton said. "I think putting that on one person would make that one person crazy. And I think it would make that person want to leave quickly."

Others argued in economic terms. Current assistant principal Boyer addressed the board, offering salary calculations under the scenario of a dean hired in lieu of an administrator and paid under the guidelines of the contract that governs teacher pay. With all the extra hours outside of a normal school day that are required to cover the duties Boyer said he currently handles, there would be little or no financial benefit to the position change.

Nome businessman Matt Tomter also made a financial argument, saying no one would take the job—especially if the district's athletic director position was additionally included in the job description—for a salary that wasn't too far off what is offered for the current assistant principal position. "A dean of students would be asking someone who is less qualified to do more work," Tomter said.

Public pleas for more discourse

In addition to critiquing the board on its decisions—and potential future decisions—regarding the make up of the Nome-Beltz administration, many speaking also expressed disappointment in how the board has responded to the public. More than one holding the microphone said they felt the board turned a deaf ear to their concerns.

"We're talking about public education here, so, therefore, the issues should remain public," said Schmidt, a parent and former board member.

That thought was echoed by another former board member, Lori Head. "I have not heard enough public discussion from this board," she said.

Tomter challenged the three board members at the meeting to allow question-and-answer style discussions at their meetings. Traditionally, the board takes public comment at the beginning of its meetings and does not engage in debate with those speaking. Tomter asked each of the three present members whether they would entertain back-and-forth discussion at future meetings. "It's going to go a long way for you and for the public," Tomter said.

Karmun, Nickels and Payenna all said they would not be opposed to question-and-answer sessions. Karmun, who is board president, said she would bring the issue to the full board before any final determination on restructuring how the board takes comment. "I think it's a great idea and I will seek the full board's input," she said. "I will seek interest of other board members before it makes the agenda."

The board was scheduled to meet again for its regular meeting April 13. The meeting was to occur after the Nugget's press deadline.

fered to build the project and lease it back to the state, or outright sell the piece of land they own across from the Board of Trade Saloon. Letters over the signature of Trudy Sobocienski, CEO of Sitnasuak and Janice Doherty, president of Nanuaq Inc., a subsidiary of Sitnasuak that leases property on Front Street to a variety of state divisions, went to DOT Commissioner Leo von Scheben, telling him the corporation was not happy with a project potentially emptying corporation rentals on Front Street. They let von Scheben know they had also told the governor's Office of Management and Budget that the corporation did not support the project moving forward on the Sixth and Steadman site.

"In short, SNC does not support the State Legislature appropriating $30 million in public funds to a project that has a negative impact on the local economy of Nome," the SNC letter said.

Doherty echoed sentiments from the letter, included in council packets, before the council Monday, saying the state could better spend the money elsewhere, perhaps to fund a $15-million project proposed for Glacier Creek Road or to provide sewer and water infrastructure to villages where sanitation issues have affected health.

By the end of the meeting, the council had passed the alternative resolution supplied to them by Nome Chamber of Commerce, asking the state to give top priority to pursuing any available alternatives to maintain the presence of state offices on Front Street.

The Department of Transportation and Public Facilities already has $1.9 million for design and site selection for the project, some of which has already been spent on behalf of placing the building at the Steadman site, Matt Desalernos, state public facilities engineer in charge of the project, said last week. He said 35 percent of the money would go into design.

"A lot has been spent or encumbered to be spent. The resolution cleared the way," Desalernos said, speaking of the council's original resolution approving the Steadman site.

Hanging in the breeze last week and this week was an additional $1 million sought in the state supplemental budget to expand the project from the original 37,500-square-foot design to 60,000 square feet to accommodate the Second District Superior Court facility, currently housed in the federal building with the post office. The state court system had preliminary plans and budget money with which to update the space in the post office building, declared surplus by the federal government, but decided to go with space in the new building.

"The court system cannot be without a home," Desalemos said last week, "now that is piled onto the project."

Desalernos said he sought a site large enough to accommodate related state agencies needing security—district attorney, court, child protective services, adult probation—behind a single secure checkpoint.

These justice sector agencies, plus troopers and public defender are in priority group one, followed by other high priority agencies—Department of Transportation and Public Facilities, elections, Legislative Information Office and Department of Fish and Game.

Low-priority occupants comprise Commerce Community and Economic Development, Labor and Workforce Development and public assistance.

The transportation commissioner, von Scheben, sent a communication to the council outlining the department's arguments for the gold company site. Among them, von Scheben stated that the price of long-term leased space would exceed the price of owner-occupation by 30 percent. Councilwoman Mary Knodel and several members of the audience returned comment that the 30 percent did not stack well along side the $39 million projected cost of construction.

Monday's council action followed a week of flying rumors that the $1.9 million had been yanked from the capital budget and the project put on hold. That money was secure, Desalernos said. The transportation department and City of Nome have been seeking the additional $1 million to carry the project forward with accommodation of the court facility pending the delivery of another $34 million next year.

Last week in a phone interview, Desalernos felt optimistic.

"We're of a mind the city is in favor of the site," he said at the time. Desalernos reserved comment Tuesday morning pending further information on the council action

Monday evening.

Desalernos met with the Nome Planning Commission earlier this year to lay out the project. The planning panel told Desalernos they had nothing to say until they received a preliminary plat, that he could get his needed resolution of site approval from the council.

The council passed the earlier resolution approving the Steadman site with only one "no" vote from Knodel, a Front Street business owner, who had previously stated her opposition. Councilman Jerald Brown, a Sitnasuak employee, did not attend that meeting.

When Councilman Stan Andersen questioned the timing of the opposition to the building site, asking why they had waited so long, both the Chamber of Commerce's Erickson and Sitnasuak's Doherty said they had not realized that the project site would be fast-tracked, that they understood that an ordinance with first and second readings with public comment would be required to vacate Sixth Avenue to allow the project to advance.

"The resolution caught me by surprise. I thought there would have to be an ordinance process," Erickson said. "This appears to be a done deal without the ordinance process."

Finding out that lobbyists were in Juneau opposing funding at the same time he and other city officials were in Juneau trying to nail it down surprised the heck out of him, Andersen said.

"If you are going to request the state take money out of the budget, we should know about it," he said. "It was embarrassing to be sitting there and someone tries to do an end run."

Mayor Denise Michels went further in her written report to the council.

Because of the phone calls and opinions expressed to the state Office of Management and Budget by Sitnasuak and Bering Straits Native corporations personnel, "we had to do a lot of damage control in Juneau to keep the $1 million that is needed for DOTPF to conduct the space needs study and design as more state agencies have come forward and are interested in the new facility," the mayor said in the report, dated April 9.

Such actions undercut the city and DOTPF, Michels told the Council.

"I was disappointed that no one approached the City of Nome and the DOTPF to inform us of their intentions," she wrote. "The City of Nome is successful in obtaining funds because we keep our word, we provide matching funds on projects and that we are a united community on the City's priorities. This incident proved different."

Desalernos told city officials at city meetings that he had explored other possibilities near Front Street, but found them too small, too near the ocean, or without adequate parking.

In a phone interview early last week, Desalernos said Sitnasuak or another entity seeking to build the facility would face the same obstacles with putting a facility downtown.

"They will have the same problem with existing lots not large enough, dealing with multiple owners [to get a large enough site]," Desalernos said.

Monday evening Knodel commented that Desalernos looked at Front Street looking for a large footprint of 60,000 square feet.

"He didn't look or indicate he had discussed with private enterprise to lease or to go up higher," she said Monday.

Following public comment from half a dozen protestors during the public comment section of the agenda, the council transacted other business and went to council comments.

When her turn came, Knodel popped the question, asking the council to discuss the sample ordinance provided by Nome Chamber of Commerce.

"We have done many things late before," she said. "It does not hurt to think it through. If there is an opportunity to have a private builder and keep it on the tax rolls, we have an obligation to look at that."

Councilman Jon Larson moved to consider. Andersen went along.

"I'm not a party-pooper," he said. When it came to a vote, Brown said he would have to abstain because he worked for Sitnasuak. To Andersen's questions on his conflict of interest, Brown said his continued employment would not be affected by his vote either way or his family members wouldn't be affected, but activities of his employer might be involved.

"You have to vote," Andersen, acting mayor, ruled.

The council voted unanimously to pass the new resolution calling for the State of Alaska to consider soliciting "build-to-suit" proposals and lease of office space, or a long-term lease, or minimize its property purchase footprint so that additional real property did not revert to exempt status, resulting in a loss of city property tax revenues.

The past two decades have seen a surprising number of Front Street businesses disappear: M'Lord and Lady, Glue Pot, True Value Hardware, Billiken Bakery, Betty Gustafson's jewelery shop, Charlie Wansor's plumbing shop, Tyree's Plumbing and Heating, Bilbo's Books, The Merc, enough to make a parlor game to name them all.

Mayor Michels and Sitnasuak's Sobocienski were out of town and did not return phone calls last week.

help host an Easter brunch for the Legislature and administration.

Revised floodplain rules

On Monday the council unanimously approved the first reading of a proposed ordinance to adopt the revised floodplain regulations, revised flood insurance rate maps and revised flood insurance study for Nome.

The proposed ordinance, which is scheduled for second reading, a public hearing and final action at the next regular council meeting, includes the following information.

Nome is subject to erosion and periodic flooding, causing serious damage to properties, health and safety hazards and other problems. Federally subsidized insurance is available to the city through the National Flood Insurance Program.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) revised the flood insurance rate map and flood insurance study for Nome. The revision reflects the latest hydraulic and hydrologic information available to FEMA for the identification of flooding risks in the community. FEMA requires that the city's floodplain regulations be revised to the latest NFIP requirements when approving revised maps. The Nome Planning Commission recently recommended that the council adopt the revised floodplain regulations and the revised flood maps.

Ballot initiative opposed

The council unanimously adopted a resolution opposing "An Initiative Creating an Alaska Anti-corruption Act" that will appear on the ballot for the Alaska primary election Aug. 24, 2010. The initiative will ask voters to decide if public funds can be used for election campaigns, but the City of Nome believes the proposed law goes much deeper than is stated and if approved by voters, it would affect municipalities in the following ways, the resolution notes.

• Municipalities will NOT be able to hire lobbyists for capital projects or for help with legislation.

• Elected officials will not be able to travel to talk with the Legislature unless they pay for the travel and lodging with their own money to conduct city business.

 Municipalities will NOT be able to have ANY person lobby unless they are specifically invited by a legislator.

The initiative prohibits holders of state or local government contracts from making political contributions of more than $500 per year and includes other restrictions. The resolution says the initiative was submitted and funded by an out-of-state initiator and has been filed in at least three other states. Voters passed the initiative in Colorado three years ago, and the law recently was struck down as unconstitutional.

Other council actions

The council sits as the Board of Equalization to hear grievances and requests for adjustments to the 2010 tax roll, and a city ordinance requires the board to convene each year. The council unanimously adopted a resolution to convene the board May 5 through May 7 at 7 p.m. in the council chambers at City Hall and continue as necessary.

Councilman Jon Larson asked that action on a resolution to grant a permit renewal for operations within the Moonlight Wells Protection Area in the 2010 mining season be postponed until the city attorney has examined the insurance requirements in the proposed permit. The council agreed to table the permit renewal resolution for Nome AK Gold Concentrates LLC until the next regular council meeting.

The council unanimously approved fee waiver requests from the Nome-Beltz High School Junior Class for use of the Mini-Convention center for a prom and from Kawerak Inc. for use of the Nome Recreation Center for a regional conference April 19-22.

New police manual

Police Chief John Papasodora reviewed a new operating procedures manual for the Nome Police Department with council members during a brief work session preceding their regular meeting. Sections of the manual are organized by task—conduct, traffic enforcement, use of force, tactical operations, domestic violence and miscellaneous policies.

Papasodora has developed forms corresponding to each section for the use of police officers. For example, he showed council members a domestic violence report form with a detailed checklist. He said an integrated, purposeful and well-planned manual will help increase the performance and professionalism of the department.

The new manual provides guidance for department personnel on a daily basis, including instructions in the absence of a supervisor and a clear chain of command, Papasodora added. He provides training—most recently in traffic enforcement—for teams of officers on Saturdays. He said two police vehicles are equipped with computers to scan driver licenses and vehicle registrations and will be used to issue electronic citations.

Andersen asked Papasodora why he had developed a new manual instead of using the previous department manual. Papasodora said the old manual contained how-to information but not clear statements of policy, lacked chain-of-command information and was poorly organized with no contiguous pagination and with sections cross-referenced in a way that would drive you crazy trying to find the referenced material. No two copies of the old manual were the same because they had been revised separately and no electronic version had been created, he added. He said the new manual is in an electronic format.

Anderson asked Papasodora what source of information he had used for the new manual. Papasodora said he had borrowed freely from an Alaska State Troopers manual with permission.

Larson asked Papasodora to instruct police dispatchers to inform the Nome Volunteer Fire Department of requests for search and rescue services after the dispatchers inform the Alaska State Troopers of search and rescue requests.

Councilmen Randy Pomeranz and Jim West Jr. were absent from the meeting.

It is never too late to say... Welcome Home Vietnam Veterans!

Burr Resolution Recognizing Day to Honor Vietnam Veterans Passes Senate FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE Friday, March 19, 2010 WASHINGTON, D.C. – Today, U.S. Senator Richard Burr (R-NC), Ranking Member of the Senate Committee on Veterans' Affairs, announced that a resolution he introduced encouraging communities across the nation to establish "Welcome Home Vietnam Veterans Day" was passed unanimously by the United States Senate.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

March 30, 2009

Mr. BURR (for himself, Mrs. BOXER, Ms. MURKOWSKI, Mr. HATCH, Mrs. SHAHEEN, Mr. INHOFE, Mr. WICKER, Mr. ROBERTS, and Mr. COCHRAN) submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to

US Senate Resolution 89

Expressing support for designation of a `Welcome Home Vietnam Veterans Day'.

Whereas the Vietnam War was fought in Vietnam from 1961 to 1975, and involved North Vietnam and the Viet Cong in conflict with United States Armed Forces and South Vietnam;

Whereas the United States became involved in Vietnam because policy-makers in the United States believed that if the Government of South Vietnam fell to a communist government then communism would spread throughout the rest of Southeast Asia;

Whereas members of the United States Armed Forces began serving in an advisory role to the Government of South Vietnam in 1961;

Whereas, as a result of the Gulf of Tonkin incidents on August 2 and 4, 1964, Congress overwhelmingly passed the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution (Public Law 88-408), on August 7, 1964, which effectively handed over war-making powers to President Johnson until such time as `peace and security' had returned to Vietnam;

Whereas, in 1965, United States Armed Forces ground combat units arrived in Vietnam;

Whereas, by the end of 1965, there were 80,000 United States troops in Vietnam, and by 1969 a peak of approximately 543,000 troops was reached:

Whereas, on January 27, 1973, the Treaty of Paris was signed, which required the release of all United States prisoners-of-war held in North Vietnam and the withdrawal of all United States Armed Forces from South Vietnam;

Whereas, on March 30, 1973, the United States Armed Forces completed the withdrawal of combat troops from Vietnam;

Whereas more than 58,000 members of the United States Armed Forces lost their lives in Vietnam and more than 300,000 members of the Armed Forces were wounded;

Whereas, in 1982, the Vietnam Veterans Memorial was dedicated in the District of Columbia to commemorate those members of the United States Armed Forces who died or were declared missing-in-action in Vietnam;

Whereas the Vietnam War was an extremely divisive issue among the people of the United States;

Whereas members of the United States Armed Forces who served bravely and faithfully for the United States during the Vietnam War were caught upon their return home in the crossfire of public debate about the involvement of the United States in the Vietnam War;

Whereas the establishment of a `Welcome Home Vietnam Veterans Day' would be an appropriate way to honor those members of the United States Armed Forces who served in Vietnam during the Vietnam War; and

Whereas March 30, 2009, would be an appropriate day to establish as `Welcome Home Vietnam Veterans Day': Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate--

(1) honors and recognizes the contributions of veterans who served in the United States Armed Forces in Vietnam; and

(2) encourages the people of the United States to observe `Welcome Home Vietnam Veterans Day' with appropriate ceremonies and activities that promote awareness of the contributions of veterans who served in the United States Armed Forces in Vietnam and the importance of helping such veterans readjust to civilian life.

There's gold in them ... musk ox!

By Mikey Lean

Most of my friends have succumbed to picking qiviut at some point in their lives here in Nome. We've all heard how it's worth $70 an ounce – like money hanging on the branches!

The qiviut inevitably languishes away in a bag in some dark corner until finally, in disgust, it's given to a friend who knows how to spin, mostly because we didn't really know what to do with it.

Alice Scherp came to town and helped us out!

Fish and Wildlife donated a musk ox fur that had been confiscated. It was ugly. Gay Sheffield helped us out, and we fleshed it at the Fish and Game lab. A couple of the ladies were already skilled, and gave good tips. (I later learned that most people hang the hide flesh side up and let the ravens clean it.)

The actual class was held at the college. I kept flashing on how this was the "perfect class" — culturally relevant, hands-on, working in groups, learning new material... in all my years of teaching, I'd never come close to what Alice did.

Alice showed us how to comb the qiviut out of the hide. It took the 10 of us two days to do it, but we pulled out about four pounds of qiviut from it. It looked better and better as we combed it. We also had to pull the worst of the long guard hairs.

Alice also showed us how to dye yarn. She gave us all a present of quiviet to work with, and taught us how to knit a lace pattern. The 10 students were all at various levels, and the already skilled knitters helped out the beginners. Alice had lots of patterns and projects to get us excited. There were inspiring samples that she and her sister, Loretta Bullard, had knit.

In the short time that she was here, we all learned a good bit. We now have a network of knitters to run to...and more qiviut yarn will be coming our way when it gets spun!

Thanks Alice – you were great!

Gear up, fishers: Herring sac roe market returns to Norton Sound

By Laurie McNicholas

The Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. and Icicle Seafoods have agreed to terms for a Norton Sound herring sac roe market this spring, according to an NSEDC press release issued last week. One processor and four tenders will travel to the region to buy product from fishermen under terms of the agree-

"The target harvest for the fishery is 1.000 tons," the release states. "Herring prices have not yet been set, but should be by the time NSEDC holds its pre-season community fishery meetings later this spring.'

Information about buying gear for the fishery through the company's revolving loan program will be available at the community meetings. Meanwhile, NSEDC urges those who plan to participate in the fishery to order herring gear through the company now to ensure they receive it before the fishery begins. Gear ordering information is available from William (Middy) Johnson, Southern Norton Sound Seafood Products Manager, phone (907)625-1192.

"That's great news that NSEDC was able to get a buyer to come north for the sac roe herring fishery," said Jim Menard, area manager for Norton Sound and Kotzebue, Alaska Dept. of Fish and Game. "This will be the first sac roe fishery since Menard provided information about the fishery's anticipated opening date and ADF&G's licensing regulations for herring fishers in an email to The Nome Nugget.

'Historically the first opening in Norton Sound occurs on average 21 days after the first opening in Togiak," he wrote. "The range is nine to 41 days. Judging by the ice, the first opening in Norton Sound will be in early June.

"Fishermen will need a 2010 Norton Sound commercial sac roe herring permit and a government issued picture identification," Menard continued. "Their fishing boat must have a 2010 ADF&G vessel license and the registration must be up to date with the Division of Motor Vehicles. Any helpers will need a 2010 crewmember's license. A State of Alaska commercial fishing permit can substitute for the crewmember's license. For example, a commercial salmon or crab permit for any State of Alaska fishery could be used as a crewmember's license.

"A crewmember's license can be bought online with a credit card at www.adfg.state.ak.us or the application can be downloaded and mailed to ADF&G with a check or money order," Menard noted. crewmember's licenses can also be bought at the ADF&G office in Nome or Unalakleet."

The Bering Sea Issues Forum scheduled April 21 from 10 a.m. to noon at the Nome Recreation Centerwill address topics of keen interest to residents of Bering Strait communities. Industrial commercial fishing, fisheries management, research and conservation plans, subsistence advocacy and the impacts of climate change on subsistence activities top the agenda.

The forum audience and panelists will continue a discussion of the Northern Bering Sea Research Area that began at Kawerak's Bering Sea forum last year and drew about 100

Letter to the SNC Shareholders

I would like to apologize to all the Shareholders of Sitnasuak for having to communicate through the news media like the Nome Nugget regarding the upcoming annual shareholders meeting on May 8, 2010 here in

Since January I have sent four letters to the corporation and their attorney (along with one e-mail message) requesting a copy of the address mailing list of shareholders. As of this date I have not received a correct mailing list.

In my January 2010 letter to the shareholders, I informed you that I would be filing as a nominee for the directors election at the May 2010 annual meeting. I did file as a nominee with SNC and with the required nominee questionnaire form and the letter of candidacy. The majority of the board however did not approve my letter of candidacy because of the ongoing litigation. This litigation was filed by myself because they (new majority) choose not to honor a valid employment contract between myself and SNCT. A second lawsuit was then filed by SNC against myself and our former business consultant.

This week I will be filing all the necessary forms so that I may run as a write-in candidate (must be nominated at the annual meeting) and will either be visiting your home or calling you for your proxy vote. I would appreciate your support and would also encourage you to attend the annual meeting. The annual meeting proxy packets have already been mailed out to the shareholders and you should be receiving them soon

The board has communicated to the shareholders regarding the changes made with the operations of SNC, and they must explain to you the effects of these changes. Some changes are required because of economic conditions or other business reasons. Some changes, however, require further explanation and more in-details on the board's justifications for these changes.

In closing, our fast spring and summer seasons are just around the corner, and I hope you can enjoy it with your family and friends. And please be safe with you and your family or friends with all of these activities associated during our short seasons.

Quyanna Sincerely. Robert "Robbie" Fagerstrom

Planning panel looking for ideas

By Sandra L. Medearis

Nome Planning Commission will draw community input into revising the goals of the community's comprehensive plan.

Early this summer, the panel will hold a visioning session where people interested in shaping the best life possible in Nome will have an opportunity to write down and discuss the community characteristics that hold value for them and also express what they consider community weaknesses.

NPC members have rolled up their sleeves on the project with guidance from Eileen Bechtol, contract city planner.

Following their latest regular meeting April 6, Bechtol laid out her suggestion for collecting ideas at a session in June, likely to meet in Old St. Joe's meeting hall, and gave commissioners an object lesson on how the public planning open house could go. There could be a table at each "station" staffed by members of NPC as focal points for such topics as strengths, weaknesses, opportunities and threatening issues concerning quality of life in Nome, Bechtol sug-

Among the tables would be a station staffed by representatives from the state Boundary Commission where folks could get more information on the process and implications of the annexation issue in considering the pros and cons.

Hearing no objections, Bechtol tacked up large sheets of paper in front of Council Chambers and got planning members engaged in considering the topics among themselves

Combined with the short meeting during which the commission approved and passed a revised flood insurance document to the Nome Common Council, the serious and hard-working group actively discussed the future of Nome for two hours, covering the walls with their ideas.

Here are a few samples for those reaching for their own thinking caps:

Strengths: subsistence resources, mineral resources, fisheries, recreation, sense of community, city services, seafood processing plant, NSEDC.

Weaknesses: alcohol, lack of balance between public and private funding, lack of affordable housing.

Opportunities: Port of Nome, Northwest Passage traffic, Pilgrim Hot Springs, college.

Threats: alcohol, high cost of energy, high cost of living.

Members of the commission are seeking information on the public sentiment toward annexation, extending City of Nome boundaries to include outlying areas. The discussion is young, with no designation of particular areas to be considered, pending public input for guidance.

"I don't think anyone here is pushing one way or another. We just want to have the discussion," NPC's president Tom Sparks, said.

Some may favor annexation to have a voice. "Some people just want to have a chance to vote," Nome's city manager Josie Bahnke, said.

Among action items, the commission rubber stamped a set of documents to do with maps, regulations and floodplain insurance rates for those who want to dwell or have businesses where there is a hazard from ocean or river waters.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency requires a revision to regulations and maps along with new water level and flood studies in areas served by the federally subsidized National Flood Insurance Program. This revision notably extends the flood hazard areas further up Dry Creek and Bourbon Creek. The new maps and regs are on file at Nome City Hall.

The City has not put the regulations before the city's attorney, as the revisions had to be approved by May 3 or Nome faced suspension from the insurance program, according to Bechtol site selection, first floor elevation, reinforcement of walls, installation of pumps, anchoring of fuel tanks and the like— for structures to resist damage from high water to protect individuals from harm and to decrease the likelihood of public expense and service interruption in case of storm surge tides during fall storms.

The regulations spell out ways—

According to the study, a comparison of old and new maps showing the Nome waterfront indicates the easily eroding sandy beach has receded from 50 to 80 feet since 1904.

Members of the commission are Sparks, Charlie Weiss, Greg Smith, Jeff Darling, Jerald Brown, Jimmy Adams and the newest, Randolph Romenesko, sworn in at the meeting.

• Jason Anderson manages the Best Use Cooperative, a group of bottom trawl fishery harvesters composed of seven companies and 17 catcherprocessor vessels that target flatfish in the Bering Sea. Anderson works with member companies to ensure that vessels remain under allocation limits.

• The North Pacific Fishery Management Council will be represented by Chris Oliver, executive director, and Nicolle Kimball, fisheries analyst. Kimball serves as staff for the council's Rural Communities Outreach Committee. Trigger Finger: How to prevent a common problem

Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

Trigger finger, also known as stenosing tenosynovitis, is a common problem in which a finger or thumb seems to click or become locked when bent leading to a painful "pop" with extension.

The human hand is an amazing instrument. With it we manipulate tools, prepare food, defend ourselves, drive machines, communicate, create works of art, show affection, greet one another, dress ourselves, and push buttons, among other actions. Much of this work is dependent on proper function of the fingers, which must smoothly flex and extend countless times daily.

Trigger finger results from damage to the tendons in the fingers or thumb. Many of the muscles that move the fingers are in the forearm, connected to the fingers by tendons that extend through a series of fibrous pulleys located at each of the joints in the hand and fingers. With excessive repetitive use or injury, the sheath surrounding these tendons can thicken and become inflamed causing damage to the tendons. This initially causes the fingers to feel stiff, especially in the morning. With time, nodules begin to form on the tendons, which may catch in the fibrous pulleys of the fingers, most commonly at the point where the fingers meet the hand. This causes a snapping sensation much like a knot being pulled through a pulley. Often the "pop" is painful and feels like the finger joint is briefly dislocating. If not corrected, the problem can worsen to the point where a person must use the other hand to straighten the bent finger.

If the condition is caught early, a few preventive maneuvers can reduce the chances that the problem will worsen or persist.

First, the most important step is to rest the affected hand for four to six weeks paying special attention to avoid repetitive gripping or grasping of tools. This may mean adjusting work, hobbies, or personal activities.

Second, a splint may be used to rest the thumb or finger in an extended position for up to six weeks. The splint may be removed for short periods each day in order to exercise the affected joint, but it should be worn again during sleep to prevent flexing the fingers for extended periods.

Third, warm water hand soaks may reduce the severity of symptoms and can be repeated many times throughout the day to preserve smooth motion of the fingers. Conversely, ice massage over the affected area for 15 minutes at a time reduces inflammation and can relieve pain.

Fourth, for more severe symptoms, non-steroidal anti-inflammatory medications like ibuprofen or naproxen sodium can alleviate pain and reduce the inflammation that leads to tendon damage. Talk to your provider if symptoms persist for more than two weeks.

If symptoms do not respond to conservative therapy, your medical provider may recommend an injection of corticosteroid into the affected tendon sheath. Depending on the severity of symptoms at presentation, this procedure can be successful at restoring smooth movement of the affected finger. In severe cases, surgical release may be required.

Patients with rheumatoid arthritis or diabetes mellitus are at higher risk for developing trigger finger. Occupations or activities that require repetitive gripping, like handling power tools, musical instruments, or sewing needles also increase a person's risk. People at increased risk should monitor for developing symptoms because early treatment has a higher chance of cure.

Trigger finger is a common nuisance often ignored for months or years, but with early recognition and treatment, most people can restore proper function to the hand and prevent the problem from becoming debilitating.

The Operating Budget is in Joint Conference Committee, which will be meeting for the next few days. Differences should be reconciled and the Conference Committee report adopted by the House and Senate late in the week.

A letter was sent thanking the Governor for the economic disaster declaration for the Yukon River and for recognizing other fisheries problems in Western Alaska. With the recent fish board resignation there is an open seat on the Board of Fisheries; the letter urges the Governor to appoint someone with subsistence or commercial fishing experience from Western Alaska. We need not only someone who is willing to listen but someone who has personal experience with the fisheries in our area and who can be an advocate when it is needed.

Rural School Construction

SB 237 addresses State aid for school construction and a funding mechanism for Regional Education Attendance Area schools. This legislation is an outgrowth of the Kasayulie v. State of Alaska lawsuit. The legislation has a good chance of passing since it is tied to a continuation of the 70 percent reimbursements of municipal school bond debt retirement. The bill provides for State aid for school construction in regional educational attendance areas, and creates a regional education attendance area school fund. There is still a need for a funding mechanism that would deal with school construction in small city districts, which have limited bonding

FINALLY HOME (top)—Kotzebue musher Quinn Iten drives his dogs to the finish line of the Kobuk 440 sled dog race April 11 on the sea ice that fronts his home town. Iten finished the race in fourth position.

SPRING FUN (above)—Kids enjoyed the snowshoe races held as part of spring carnival celebrations April 11 on the sea ice in front of Kotzebue.

CAT AND DOGS (right)—Tok musher Hugh Neff took along the Cat in a Hat on the Kobuk 440 trail as he headed out of Kotzebue on the 440-mile long sled dog race April 9. Neff finished the race in second place behind the winner, Kotzebue's John Baker.

not by airplane, but had decided to snowmachine from Shishmaref to Kotzebue with his wife Evelyn and handlers, towing their dogs in a dog box across the rough trail on the sea ice. Olanna said his main leader sustained injuries on the trip as the dog box tipped over a few times when they were hitting rough spots on the trail. Olanna ended up winning the Sportsmanship Award of the Arctic Circle Championship race. The Kotzebue Dog Musher Association decided to let the one-day results stand as final results.

The only race that had a start, middle and end was the Kobuk 440 as 12 mushers headed into the beginning of the storm on Friday at 4:40 p.m. They had to battle winds, soft trails and whiteout conditions during the storm, but all prevailed and finished. Familiar names were right there up at the top with John Baker of Kotzebue winning the event, and Tok's Hugh Neff coming in second. Bethel's Pete Kaiser finished third with local racer Quinn Iten following only five minutes later to a fourth place finish. Tracey Schaeffer, who won the Comeback Award as well as the Humanitarian Award at Monday night's musher's banquet, finished the race on Monday at 3:49 p.m. with nine dogs in 12th place. Schaeffer had suffered serious injuries during a horrific collision of her dog team with a snowmachine driver last year. A person who she took out for the first time on a dog sled was killed in the accident. Schaeffer said at the beginning of the race that she worked hard all year to get her team and herself to reach the goal of finishing the Kobuk 440 this season.

When the blizzard took a break on Sunday, sun and blue skies drew locals out to the sea ice to watch the first-ever spring festival harpoon-throwing contest. Soldiers involved with the joint military exercise Operation Arctic Care lined up on the sea wall, cameras in hand to take photos of the activities on the sea ice. Harpoon thrower Kirk Howard won the 40-foot target-hitting contest. Chris Norton won the distance-throwing contest when he thrust his harpoon 86.9 feet onto the sea ice.

Kobuk 440 results (finishing times not available at press time): 1) John Baker; 2) Hugh Neff; 3) Pete Kaiser; 4) Quinn Iten; 5) Jim Bourquin; 6) Kelley Griffin; 7) Jodi Bailey; 8) Karl Leissner; 9) Jake Berkowitz; 10) Micah Degerlund; 110 Harry Douglas; 12) Tracey Schaeffer.

Arctic Circle Championship results (20-miles): 1) Gregg Taylor, 1:11:36; 2) Shane Goosen, 1:12:23; 3) Paul Hanson, 1:12:59; 4) Luke Sampson, 1:13:23; 5) Bill Kornmuller, 1:13:39; 6) John Gallahorn, 1:15:13; 7) Cyrus Harris, 1:17:31; 8) Nils Hahn, 1:18:22; 9) Diana Haecker, 1:24:40; 10) Daniel Olanna, 1:27:06.

Mayor Michels sets her sights on Juneau

By Tyler Rhodes

Nome Mayor Denise Michels is ready to serve a broader electorate.

On April 21, Michels announced her intent to seek the Democratic nomination for lieutenant governor in the Aug. 24 statewide primary election. Michels, who has been Nome's mayor since 2003, said she has been mulling the idea of running for the office for the past six months. "I have been thinking where could I be the most effective?" she said April 23.

Michels' desire to take on a broader political role in Alaska has been no secret. She threw her hat in the ring to fill House District 39's open seat after the death of Rep. Richard Foster last fall. While that seat will also be up for election this year, Michels said she opted to seek the lieutenant governor's office after watching Foster's son's performance in the Legislature. "Neal Foster is doing very well since his appointment," she said. Foster is currently the only candidate signed up for the race, and Michels said she would throw her support behind him.

The only other Democrat officially running for the lieutenant governor's office is Diane Benson, a familiar face in recent statewide elections. Both Michels and Benson are Alaska Native. "I'm looking forward to debating with her and see where she stands," Michels said.
